Jewish choir participates in global competition

By JESSICA FREIMAN
CJN Intern

Toronto's Lachan Jewish Chamber Choir is heading east this summer. But the choir won't be landing at Ben-Gurion airport or praying at the Western Wall. They'll be visiting a much longer wall in a much larger country. Lachan is going to China.

The choir members and their conductor, Cantor Benjamin Maissner of Holy Blossom Temple, are set to compete in the 4th World Choir Games in Xiamen, China, this July. Xiamen is a southern Chinese coastal town, 500 kilometres to the north of Hong Kong.

Lachan, one of two choirs representing Canada (the other is Le Collège Vocal des Choeurs du Nouveau Monde), will be in the company of 400 other groups and 20,000 singers from countries spanning the globe – from Israel to Botswana to Saudi Arabia to Kazakhstan.

"We've spent eight months preparing for the competition," Maissner said. "We have built up and fine-tuned our repertoire."

Lachan, meaning "melody" in Hebrew, will perform a wide variety of musical styles in China, including liturgical, folk, Israeli, Yiddish and jazz.

"The mandate of the choir is to widen the awareness of Jewish values and culture," Maissner said.

He described the factors that make Jewish music distinctive. "There is a very tribal quality to the music of our people that makes us sound unique, but we are also influenced by our environments, like eastern European klezmer or American jazz or classical Romantic.

"But it's the Hebrew inflection and asymmetric meter of the language that makes Jewish music different."

Because Lachan is a unique kind of Jewish group, World Choir Games officials were uncertain as to which category the choir should compete under.

"We cover every aspect of music: religious, ethnic, cultural, jazz," Maissner said. "So, they created a special category just for us: music of religion and ethnic and folklore."

The World Choir Games' jury will consist of top conductors and renowned musician from Germany, Hungary, Sweden and China. What the judges will be looking for, Maissner said, "is the level of the choir's musicianship in terms of interpretation, tone, quality, dynamics, variety and the musical versatility of the group."

"This is my first trip to China," Maissner said. "I think it's very exciting because I think that there are many in China interested in studying about Jewish culture and heritage. I understand that there are even Jewish studies chairs in some of the university in China.

"In order for the Chinese to understand the West, they study Jewish culture," according to Maissner, so the presence of a Jewish group at the competition should make for a cultural exchange.

Lachan's repertoire will spotlight four Canadian Jewish composers in Xiamen: Srul Irving Glick, Sid Robinovitch, Ben Steinberg and Aaron Charlap. As well, old favourites like the Yiddish lullaby Raisins and Almonds and the Israeli folksong Shir HaEmek will be featured.

Before Lachan jets off to China, its concert – "Jewish Identity through the Musical Lens" – at the Leah Posluns Theatre will give Torontonians the opportunity to preview the songs Lachan will be singing at the World Music Games. Proceeds from the concert on Monday, June 12, at 8 p.m. will go toward funding the choristers' trip to China. For tickets, call 416-782-3214.

Tribute dinner to help fund leukemia research

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Michael Baker, physician-in-chief of the University Health Network is being honoured at a gala dinner this month sponsored by the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science & the Toronto General and Western Hospital Foundation.

The event will be held June 15 at the Sheraton Centre Hotel in downtown Toronto. The University Health Network (UHN) consists of Toronto General, Toronto Western and Princess Margaret Hospitals.

The goal of the dinner is to raise funds to support leukemia research. As of mid-May, nearly $4 million dollars had been raised, an amount Baker said "sets a new standard for fundraising."

Baker was born in Toronto in 1943 and went through medical school and interned "in the same hospital in which I was born, and where I am now."

While doing residencies at Mount Sinai School of Medicine in New York City, in internal medicine and hematology, he became interested in adult leukemia.

"In the 1960s, that was a new area of interest," he said.

For the first 10 years after he returned to Toronto, he was doing fundamental research into the disease. Even after he became the UHN's physician-in-chief in 1993, he said, "I never gave up my medical practice, especially patients with certain adult leukemias."

Adult leukemia used to be seen as hopeless, he said, noting that he was "a pioneer in uncharted territory."

Baker helped develop the drug Ara-C, which, he said, is still in use.

He considers it gratifying that he "can give hope. I still follow patients who are alive after 15 or 20 years."

It was through his practice that he became involved with the Canadian Society for Weizmann Institute of Science.

"I treated [the late] Arthur Konvisser, who then was its president. We wanted to raise money for leukemia research, to benefit both the UHN and Weizmann."

The money raised from the tribute dinner will go to stem cell transplant research for leukemia patients at Princess Margaret Hospital in Toronto, and for work on the basic science of stem cell research in leukemia being done by Yair Reisner, a professor of immunology at the Weizmann Institute in Rehovot.

Not only have he and Reisner exchanged visits, but the two institutions have trained each other's researchers.

While he said he's "embarrassed by all the publicity," Baker said he is proud that "the money is being used so cleverly."

Baker does not spend all his time in medicine. Music is an important and precious part of his life. He and his brother, an oral surgeon, play classical and semi-classical duets on the piano, and for 15 years, they have played duets for Life Beat, a fundraising show.

He and his wife, Barbara, a nurse, even belong to a neighbourhood book club and a tennis club. The couple met when he was a medical student at Toronto General and she was a nurse at Mount Sinai. They have two married children, Jeff, a lawyer (and also a musician) and Jillian, a doctor, and two grandchildren.

device and camouflage clothes. Media reports suggested the suspects had trained in remote locations north of Toronto.

Although police officials have been quiet as to possible targets, media reports suggested that the Toronto Stock Exchange, the Toronto headquarters of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service and the Peace Tower on Parliament Hill were being considered.

"These individuals were allegedly intent on committing acts of terrorism against their own country and their own people," said Prime Minister Stephen Harper. "Canada is not immune to the threat of terrorism."

Media reports noted Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden had singled out Canada, along with the United States, Britain, Australia and Spain, as a possible target.

While there was no indication Jews were specifically targeted by the suspects, terrorism expert David Harris suggested Jews should be concerned by the evidence of a possible homegrown terrorist group.

"Any time you have an Islamic radical threat, one of the first targets is inevitably Jewish people," he said. "The dehumanization of Jews has been an important element in radical Islamic ideology."

Harris, director of the international terrorist intelligence program at INSIGNIS Strategic Research, said Islamic radicals have previously considered striking Jewish targets. Ahmed Ressam, the millennium bomber whose plot to bomb the Los Angeles airport was foiled by a U.S. border guard, was part of a terrorist cell "that discussed striking Jewish-related targets in Montreal," Harris said.

A Jewish school library in Montreal was firebombed by people motivated by extremist Islamic fundamentalism, he added.

Harris, who recently joined the Canadian Coalition for Democracies as senior fellow for national security, said the Jewish community must ensure the physical security of its institutions, and "Jews should agitate like crazy [for Canada] to take control of its nearly out-of-control immigration system."

About 250,000 immigrants and refugees are admitted each year, and there is no realistic way to provide a security screening for all of them, he said.

American terrorism expert Steven Emerson, executive director of the Investigative Project, an organization that studies terrorism, said "there is no evidence the [17 suspects] were targeting Jewish institutions, but the Jewish community like all other Canadian communities should be concerned."

Jews could have been killed in a random attack, he said, adding, "There is always the potential for terrorists to consider Jewish institutions along with other targets."

In the United States after 9/11, the Portland Seven "were considering targeting Jewish schools," and last summer, Islamic militants were arrested for plotting attacks against Los Angeles synagogues, Emerson stated.

Emerson said the Ontario arrests could change the way Canada is perceived in connection to terrorism. "Even the United States conventionally thought of Canada as a way station, not as a target. This has changed the way people see it."

Canada, he concluded, now is home to "a critical mass of jihadists" – people who share the bin Laden mindset, but who are probably acting on their own.

Leading legal scholar dies at 68

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

Obituary

WINNIPEG — Barney Sneiderman, one of Canada's leading legal scholars and medical ethicists, died in Winnipeg May 29 at age 68 from pancreatic cancer.

Sneiderman was originally from Connecticut and graduated from the University of Connecticut Law School in 1964. He practised law in Connecticut and also worked as a journalist in South Africa for short periods of time before earning a master's degree from New York University in 1967.

That same year, he was recruited to join the law faculty at the University of Manitoba. At the time of his death, he was an associate director of the University of Manitoba's Centre for Professional and Applied Ethics.

He was also a published author and journalist.

"Barney was a very interesting guy," said Allan Fineblit, executive director of the Law Society of Manitoba and one of Sneiderman's former students. "He had strong views on legal policy and what the law should be. He also had a strong interest in medical and end-of-life issues."

Over the years, Sneiderman spoke out in favour of physician-assisted suicide, euthanasia and the decriminalization of marijuana, positions he voiced regularly in the pages of the Winnipeg Free Press and other Canadian newspapers.

Fineblit noted that Sneiderman was in great demand as a speaker at medical conferences. Last month, the University of Manitoba's faculty of medicine honoured Sneiderman for his contributions to medical ethics during the course of his career.

One of Sneiderman's other passions, Fineblit recalled, was military history and in particular history related to the rise of the Nazis and World War II. His most recent book, which is to be released soon, is a military history titled Warriors Seven: Seven American Commanders, Seven Wars and the Irony of Battle.

Fineblit described Sneiderman as culturally Jewish, but said he had a low opinion of organized religion.

"Other than for a family bar or bat mitzvah, the only time he would go to shul would be when he was asked to speak."

Sneiderman is survived by his wife, two daughters, a son, and a sister.

Israel sends Iran a message via Hezbollah

While Iran's nuclear ambitions continue to make headlines, its support of the Lebanon-based Hezbollah terror group was recently in the news following a cross-border flare-up between Hezbollah and Israel.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

An Associated Press report by Karen Laub, "Israel says Hezbollah positions destroyed," May 29, chronicled the fighting. Tensions began "after a senior official in the violent Palestinian group Islamic Jihad was killed in a car bomb in the southern Lebanese town of Sidon last week. Israel has denied involvement."

On May 27, "fighting began when Katyusha rockets were fired from Lebanon at Israel's northern Galilee region, hitting an air force base, followed by attacks on Israeli outposts along the border.

Israeli commander Brig.-Gen. Gal Hirsch told AP that most of the dozens of Hezbollah outposts along the Israel-Lebanese border were destroyed.

These dozens of outposts, along with other Hezbollah military installations, operate in defiance of two UN Security Council resolutions: 425, which calls upon the Lebanese government to exercise its sovereign authority in the south, and 1559, which mandates the government to disarm all militias.

Egged on by Syria and its ally Iran, Lebanon allows Hezbollah to operate as a separate force against Israel in particular, even though Israel withdrew to a UN-certified border. Lebanon thus persists in refusing to comply with the world body.

AP reports that Hirsch "said he's seen a strong presence of Iranian Revolutionary Guards in southern Lebanon. 'Hezbollah is a wing of the Iranian effort to create a front line against the West,' he said, noting that the Iranians train and supply Hezbollah fighters."

In "Tel Aviv within range of new Iran-supplied Hezbollah rocket" (Ha'aretz, May 29), Ze'ev Schiff writes about Hezbollah's new, Iranian-supplied missiles that are "capable of hitting targets up to 200 kilometres away, putting all of Israel's major urban centres – including the southern city of Be'er Sheva – within striking distance."

Schiff explains that the rockets "have appeared under different names. One is Zelzal-2, and its earlier model is the Zelzal-1. Another Iranian name for the rocket is Nazeat."

They were "first seen in a military parade in Tehran in September 2005, the first such event following the election of Mahmoud Ahmadinejad as president. Six Shehab-3 surface-to-surface ballistic missiles were also on display.

"In response to slogans written on the Shehab-3 rockets, calling for 'Death to Israel' and 'Death to the U.S.,' the military attaches of France, Italy, Greece and Poland, invited to the event, left the VIP platform."

The Zelzal rockets are reportedly in Lebanon under the control of the Revolutionary Guards. They have not been used against Israel. But analysts warn that if Hezbollah, under Iranian supervision, were to fire these rockets, which unlike Katyushas have a clear "made-in-Iran" identification, that would amount to a declaration of war, a statement that Iran has become a front line state by proxy against Israel. At that point, the entire regional strategic equation would change.

To prevent this, among other steps, Israel had to send a clear message not only to Hezbollah, but also to Iran.

In "Israel changes the rules of the game" (Winnipeg Free Press, May 30), Samuel Segev argued that Israel's strikes were so precise and devastating that Hezbollah was forced to accept a ceasefire brokered by the Lebanese government, following the intervention of U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan.

According to Segev, Hezbollah calculated, wrongly, that it could provoke Israel by firing missiles into the Galilee without incurring major retaliation, "[n]aively believing that Israel is powerless in the face of Iranian-supported Hezbollah."

Instead, Israel's military operation sent a "clear… message to Hezbollah, and to its Syrian and Iranian mentors that henceforth the rules of the game have been changed."

Despite Israel's strong military response, and Lebanon's brokered ceasefire, Hezbollah remains a threat, as Iran and Syria's proxy, not only to Israel, but also to Lebanon.

Dinner to honour Dr. Michael Baker

Still, he finds tremendous satisfaction in his administrative duties. "I get immense joy, almost a parental joy, in recruiting and encouraging young doctors."

Admittedly, Baker said, there are a lot of meetings, and a degree of aggravation.

"But that's the price you pay. Your decisions have an impact on people's welfare, their health, and their careers."

He said the medical shows so prevalent on television these days "amuse" him because of their dramatization of day-to-day life in hospitals.

"They underplay the sheer volume of the ordinary hard work it takes to care for sick people – the routine and unglamorous hard work. And they overplay the romance," he said.

Would he choose medicine as a career again? "With enthusiasm," he said, calling it exciting and fulfilling.

"Angelo believes it is better for these issues to be out in the open and discussed by a group of people rather than pushed underground. In fact, the deviantART community has responded strongly to such artwork in the past and the overwhelming reaction has been that denying the Holocaust is an ignorant point of view.

"By showing how highly unpopular this viewpoint is in a public context like deviantART, the site and its members actually bolster the correct portrayal of the Holocaust."

"The Policy Violations team definitely keeps an eye on users who express these points of view and if they cross a line, they will be banned – as is the case with this user," Reynolds stated.

Michaels said despite her run-ins with deviantART's help desk, she still enjoys viewing the artwork available on the site. However, she has started an online petition at another Web address asking supporters to say "no to hate on deviantART.

"There are still a lot of other hateful parts that deviantART members have uploaded and they are all active," she said.

On the Green 2006

An exciting and fun day on the green will send vital help to the Shaare Zedek Medical Center in Jerusalem.

On the Green 2006, Shaare Zedek's 16th Annual Golf Tournament, will be held June 15th at Caledon Woods Golf Club, a ClubLink Course.

Sponsored by The Home Game, 144 golfers will take to the links in support of the department of pediatric medicine at Shaare Zedek Medical Center in Jerusalem.

Golfers will enjoy 18 holes of golf, barbecue lunch and dinner catered by Zuchter Berk, as well as a raffle, silent auction and amazing prizes.

"This is guaranteed to be a great year" said committee co-chairs Jarrod Saltzman and Joel Solish. "We're both committed and excited to be carrying on this tradition and improving on it to help raise funds needed by the hospital."

In past years, On the Green has generated net proceeds upwards of $600,000 and this number is expected to increase. "We hope everyone will come out and make a difference" concluded Saltzman and Solish.

Shaare Zedek is known as the Hospital with a Heart for its century-long reputation for treating patients rather than just their illnesses, with an extra dimension of caring.

Film screening generates hostile reaction

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Shahina Siddiqui, a high-profile Winnipeg Muslim, filed a complaint with the Winnipeg Police Department ahead of the May 29 Canadian debut of the film Obsession: Radical Islam's War Against the West.

But if her goal was to warn people away from the documentary, all the media exposure generated by her opposition to it – as well as that of like-minded opponents of Israel, including some Jewish leftists – produced the opposite effect.

There was so much demand to see the film that the screening's sponsors – the Asper Foundation, the Winnipeg Zionist Initiative and Aish HaTorah – had to schedule a second showing for the next evening.

Siddiqui, the president of the Islamic Social Services Association of Canada, and her supporters watched the film in a private screening on May 26. They described the film as containing hate propaganda against Islam and Muslims.

Winnipeg Police spokesperson Sgt. Kelli Dennison said that, in response to Siddiqui's complaint, the police sent an officer to view the film, but he said no further action is being considered.

In introducing the film, Winnipeg Zionist Initiative chairman Jeremy Feuer said that the documentary was not anti-Muslim but rather anti-terror.

"Obsession shows how Islamic extremists are enemies of human rights," he said. "They abuse women and children and are opposed to freedom of speech and freedom of religion. And the people who are the principal victims are moderate Muslims."

Obsession was produced by Honestreporting.com, a media watchdog group that monitors what it sees as western media bias against Israel. The hour-long documentary shows scenes of graphic violence, including an Arab-language television show showing "Jews" supposedly slitting a Christian boy's throat to gather his blood for making matzah and bloodthirsty cartoons and TV shows from the Arab world featuring former Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon drinking Arab blood.

Footage of the aftermath of terrorist attacks around the world is interspersed with comments from terror experts such as Daniel Pipes, Steven Emerson and John Loftus, as well as moderate Muslims such as Palestinian journalist Khaled Abu Toameh and Canadian professor and journalist Salim Mansur, and news clips from around the Muslim and western world of Muslim religious and political leaders calling for death to Jews, America, the West, and all non-Muslims.

There are also segments depicting indoctrination of children in the Arab world and pointing out the links between Arabs and Nazi Germany and the similarities between Nazi and Arab hate propaganda against Jews.

Following the May 29 screening of the film, Egyptian-born Nonie Darwish, founder of "Arabs for Israel," described her journey away from extremism to speaking out against Islamic extremists.

Darwish was born in Cairo and raised in Gaza, where, she recalls, she was taught to hate Jews. Her father was a high-ranking Egyptian military leader charged with sending fedayeen to attack Israel. He was assassinated by the Israel Defence Forces in 1956 when Nonie was eight years old.

"I remember being praised as the daughter of a shahid [martyr]," she said. "I just wanted my father back. My sisters and brothers and I were asked which of us was going to avenge our father's death by killing Jews when we grew up."

Darwish's awakening began after moving to the United States when she was 30. Many of the friends she made were Jewish, and she began learning about the other side of the story.

"The choice was between sending him to a hospital in Cairo of to Hadassah Hospital in Israel," she recalled. "All our Arab friends told us to send him to Hadassah Hospital if we wanted him to live. It showed that in a crisis situation, the Arabs trusted the Jews more than their fellow Arabs."

But Darwish was truly galvanized into action by the Sept. 11 attacks. Since then, she has been a frequent speaker on television and in public forums, warning about the dangers of Islamic extremism and calling on all people, including other Muslims, to stand up against it.

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

They may be in their 50s and 60s, but this summer Geraldine Sherman, Fran Cappe, Bruce Cole and Susan Palter are going back to camp, along with up to 250 of their peers.

Sherman, a Toronto writer who turns 65 this month, is co-chair of the Camp Kawagama reunion, being held Sept. 16 at the Haliburton site of the camp she attended as a youngster.

For small-town Jews like Sherman, who grew up in Chatham, Ont., the camp played a "hugely important" role. "There was always a Shabbat ceremony, and [almost] everybody there was Jewish, which when you're the only Jewish child in your class is a revelation… You realize that Jewish kids come in all shapes and sizes. Some you like and some you don't, but being Jewish was just something taken for granted."

The reunion came about as the result of a CBC radio documentary by former Kawagamite Sam Levene, and a 2001 article by Sherman in Toronto Life magazine titled "The Girls of Summer."

Cappe, who attended the camp from 1956 to 1967, has organized her own mini-reunion for the September event, tracking down former cabinmates in Los Angeles, San Diego, Pittsburgh, Buffalo, New York and Vancouver. In all, 14 women, most of whom have had no contact for more than 40 years, will room together for the reunion. The four Torontonians in the group will meet the others at the airport and drive north together.

Despite some initial anxiety over whether they would still have anything in common, Cappe, a 57-year-old social worker and chair of the alumni committee, said that through e-mails and some phone calls, they have discovered that their connections "are still really strong… There is a huge excitement about [seeing] one another."

Several of the women have confessed to crying while reading each other's e-mails and many of them now compulsively check for each other's news, she wrote on the reunion website (www.kawagama2006.com).

Although many camps have reunions, Cappe said this one is particularly exciting because it is being held at the original site. "It's pretty special. It's on an island in beautiful Haliburton. It's absolutely isolated and private. The whole island is the camp. It's breathtakingly beautiful."

Cappe praised camp owners Elsie Palter, a psychologist, and her husband David for their "extraordinary understanding of what children needed... For many of us, it permanently shaped our values." Citing the camaraderie and spirit that pervaded the camp, she said she learned about the importance of friendships and relationships, and valuing "the way you do things" over winning or losing.

Susan Halpern, the Palters' daughter and a cabinmate of Sherman's, told The CJN from her home in Berkeley, Ca., that her parents, who had met at a B'nai Brith camp, were prompted by their love of children to "take this huge risk" of buying an island and asking parents to entrust them with the care of their children.

"What was really important to me [at camp] was the sense of community," said Halpern, a psychotherapist by training who met her husband at Kawagama. "The people in my cabin came back year after year."

Reunion activities will include entertainment featuring old show tunes performed at camp, a memorial tree planting ceremony, and a "passing of the torch" to Moorelands' executive director.

Organizers are also raising funds for a new cabin to be built for Moorelands campers.

Donations for the new cabin can be made by calling 416-446-9987 ext. 308, or sending a cheque to Moorelands Community Services, Kawagama Reunion 2006, 250 Merton St., Suite 504, Toronto, Ontario M4S 1B1.

Obituary

Ostry was a prominent civil servant

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Bernard Ostry, a former high-ranking and influential federal and provincial civil servant in the areas of culture and broadcasting who was known for his accomplishments in Canadian public service, died of cancer at his home in Toronto on May 24. He was 78.

Bernard Ostry

He was born in the rural farming community of Wadena, Sask., where his father ran a general store. He was sent to live in a Jewish orphanage in Winnipeg for several years so he could learn to read the Torah for his bar mitzvah.

He attended public school in Winnipeg and high school in Flin Flon, Man. He graduated from the University of Manitoba and went to England to teach international history at the University of London.

In England, he became reacquainted with his future wife, Sylvia Knelman, who had attended public school with him in Winnipeg. She held a teaching position at Oxford University and went on to become an internationally known economist.

He returned to Canada from England in the 1960s and subsequently held positions in Ottawa with the Research Council of Canada and deputy ministerial positions in both the federal and the Ontario provincial governments, where he was responsible for citizenship programs and communications, and later, industry and tourism.

His love of art and culture drew him to associations with the Royal Ontario Museum, the McMichael Canadian Collection and the Art Gallery of Ontario. He also served as secretary general of the National Museum of Canada.

He collected Art Deco art and furniture and the Royal Ontario Museum published a book on his Art Deco furniture. He donated a collection of 17th-and 18th-century furniture to Government House in Ottawa and he has made significant donations to museums and art galleries.

In 1985, he became chair and chief executive officer of TVOntario, retiring in 1992.

With his long record of public service, he was named to the Order of Canada.

He has been involved with publishing, and assisted with the publication of The Sterling Public Servant: A Global Tribute to Sylvia Ostry; At the Global Crossroads: The Sylvia Ostry Foundation Lectures (six lectures given annually which explore the global economy); and Visions of Canada, The Alan Plaunt Memorial Lectures 1958-1992, co-edited by him.

The Ostrys have supported many Jewish causes, including ORT, for which they served as honorary presidents.

He is survived by his wife Sylvia, his sons Adam and Jonathan, two grandsons Daniel and Joshua and his brother George.

Israeli doctoral student wins peace fellowship

An Israeli law student at the University of Toronto is the recipient of Canadian Friends of Peace Now's (CFPN) first annual Peace Fellowship.

Meital Pinto is writing her doctoral thesis on an Israeli legal framework for the advancement of minority language rights.

She received the award, which includes a sum of $2,000, at a recent luncheon in her honour at the University of Toronto Faculty Club, attended by CFPN board members as well as several prominent academics and senior officials of the New Israel Fund and the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy.

"We had several excellent applicants from across Canada," said Sheldon Gordon, CFPN board member, "but the panel that adjudicated the competition was unanimous in choosing Meital Pinto.

"Anyone who has read her impressive resume and her research proposal would certainly understand why they came to that conclusion."

Pinto earned her bachelor of law degree, magna cum laude, from the Interdisciplinary Centre in Herzliya, Israel, where she was research assistant to Amnon Rubenstein, dean of law and former education minister.

She clerked for a justice of the Israeli Supreme Court and then earned her master of law degree from the University of Toronto.

Her doctoral research is aimed at the development of a legal framework which would guarantee Arabic-language rights in Israel in order to improve the status of Israel's Arab minority through greater recognition of their cultural identity.

The judges were Derek Penslar, professor of history and director of the Jewish studies department at University of Toronto; Mira Sucharov, assistant professor of political science at Carleton University; and Fred Zemans, professor emeritus of law at York University.

CFPN offers the fellowship to a deserving doctoral student at any Canadian university whose research is consistent with the mission, goals and values of Peace Now, in particular with its advocacy of a Palestinian-Israeli peace based upon mutual recognition, a secure, viable state for the Palestinians and a secure, Jewish state for the Israelis.

Jewish CUPE members upset at union resolution

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Four years ago at its regional convention, the Ontario wing of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) adopted a last-minute, emergency resolution that critics argued was biased against Israel.

Many of CUPE's Jewish members – including those employed by five Jewish agencies in the Toronto area – were incensed at the one-sided nature of the resolution, which in part claimed Israel "invaded" territories in 1967, ignoring the aggression of Israel's Arab neighbours.

Around the same time, a CUPE official was seen carrying a CUPE flag at a rally protesting a speaking engagement of former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Carolyn Roberts, president of CUPE local 2137, which represents 170 workers at Jewish Vocational Services of Greater Toronto, recalls being "blindsided" by the 2002 vote, and she feels that with the recent resolution attacking Israel that was adopted two weeks ago at CUPE Ontario's regional convention, it's pretty much a case of déjà vu all over again.

The resolution is part of an international effort to boycott Israeli products and divest assets from Israel. The resolution criticizes Israel for failing to recognize a Palestinian right to self-determination and slams Israel's "apartheid wall," the barrier Israel is constructing to prevent terrorist attacks that originate in the West Bank.

Katharine Nastovski, chair of CUPE Ontario's international solidarity committee, said boycotts worked against South Africa and should be used to force Israel to permit "the right of [Palestinian] refugees to return to their homes and property."

Roberts believes that leaving CUPE would be going too far, but she is upset that the regional wing of CUPE is making international statements, leaving people like her to field angry calls from members who want to know why their union is dabbling in Middle Eastern politics.

Local 2137 is a member of CUPE National, not the Ontario division, but the union's members feel they have been implicated in the Ontario vote, she said.

"I'm embarrassed to have to speak to my members about this issue," Roberts said. "I think it's embarrassing to CUPE National."

Four years ago, many CUPE members expressed dissatisfaction with the vote, and it was made clear to CUPE Ontario president Sid Ryan that employees at the Toronto Jewish agencies were angry as well, Roberts said. Given that CUPE touts solidarity among members as a key value and proclaims "an injury to one is an injury to all," she wondered why CUPE Ontario is adopting resolutions that so many members find offensive.

Lil Nobel, president of CUPE Local 2063, which represents workers from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Canadian Jewish Congress and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services Toronto, said, "We are ashamed to be a members of this union. Despite what Mr. Ryan says, the resolution is an affront to the Jewish people, because it singles out Israel among all the countries in the world.

"There are many urgent issues affecting workers in this province. Israel's policies are not one of them. We don't understand why this outrageous, unreasonable and unbalanced resolution is taking precedence."

Local 2063 pulled out of CUPE Ontario following its vote on Israel four years ago, joining CUPE National, Nobel added.

CUPE National weighed into the fray with a news release stating it would not urge local unions to join a boycott of Israel.

"CUPE National has a policy that was adopted at our 2003 national convention. That policy states that we 'demand that the Israeli Government immediately withdraw from the occupied territories and abide by UN Resolution 242 and 338; call for and actively work towards an end to all acts of violence that take the lives of innocent people, whether they be Palestinian or Israeli; and, help develop a peace process based on equality between Israelis and Palestinians and based on the implementation of UN resolutions and international law.'"

CUPE National concluded by suggesting, "Debates focused on the Middle East should respect the legitimate aspirations of both the Palestinian and Israeli people."

Ryan told The CJN the resolution was not aimed at Jews but at the policies of Israel. It was adopted in a unanimous vote at the CUPE convention and was submitted in accordance with union protocols, leaving ample opportunity for opponents to raise their concerns.

He defended the apartheid references, saying "it's clear to anybody with any degree of common sense that there are clear parallels with what is happening in Palestine to South Africa."

As to the issue of Palestinian self-determination, he dismissed suggestions Israeli leaders had already acknowledged that, saying "I come out of Ireland and know about the right to self-determination. You can't have self-determination without a viable state.

"It's no different than Northern Ireland. You had acts of terrorism in Northern Ireland. Does that mean you put down the entire population because of the actions of a few?"

When The CJN suggested to Ryan the separation barrier had led to a dramatic reduction in terrorist attacks, Ryan shot back, "Maybe if the occupation wasn't taking place, the bombings wouldn't be taking place."

Steven Shulman, director of Canadian Jewish Congress's Ontario region, said Congress and the Canada-Israel Committee had received numerous complaints about the CUPE resolution. Not only are many of CUPE's Jewish members upset, but many calls and e-mails are coming from non-Jews equally concerned about the resolution. An e-mail "action alert" by Congress called on Canadians to denounce the resolution to CUPE Ontario's leadership and it urged CUPE Ontario members to voice their disapproval of the resolution to their local union leaders. The mailing questions why CUPE Ontario would pass a resolution after Israel withdrew from Gaza and parts of the West Bank and had announced it would continue to pull out of more territory.

"Why would CUPE Ontario call for a boycott that will punish Israelis just as these important steps are being taken?" the mailing asks.

Ryan said CUPE Ontario plans to follow the resolution with an action plan that will include educating members about the situation, work with the Canadian Labour Congress to adopt a similar position, lobby against the "apartheid-like practices of the state of Israel," and examine appropriate areas of boycott and divestment of CUPE assets. Most major Muslim and Arab groups strongly endorsed the CUPE Ontario resolution, including the Canadian Islamic Congress, the Canadian Arab Federation, the Muslim Canadian Congress and the Canadian Council on American-Islamic Relations.

Golden Gate diet offers new ways to lose weight successfully

By NORENE GILLETZ

Summer is almost here and warmer weather also means more time outdoors. We can no longer cover up those extra pounds with heavy, bulky clothing to hide the damage of winter's hibernation. Many of my readers are always looking for the perfect diet to lose weight. They're also concerned with finding a healthy way to accomplish their goal.

Recently, I've received several books for review offering dieting advice, some with excellent suggestions, others that make it seem much too complicated.

One of the most interesting books that appeared on my desk is The Golden Gate Diet (Midsummer Press) by Dr. Adam Brook, a Harvard-educated surgeon and weight loss authority. The diet Brook has developed is easy to follow and doesn't call for extreme measures. It is a way to lose weight and a way to eat healthy, based on his clinical experiences with his patients and his extensive knowledge of the scientific literature relating to weight issues.

You can check out his website at www.goldengatediet.com for some excerpts from the book. You'll learn about Sleep-Wake and Hunger-Satiety Rhythms, Popular Diets that Don't Work, and a sample meal plan.

Brook told me: "The Golden Gate diet is the natural way to lose weight. It is based on the latest research from the leading centres and my experiences with my patients. People on the Golden Gate Diet will lose weight and reduce their risk of heart disease, cancer and diabetes."

His experience treating people with weight problems has shown that it's best to keep things as simple as possible. He offers the following advice to his patients trying to lose weight, yet stay healthy while doing it:

- If you eat foods with a low caloric density, you will lose weight; if you eat foods with a high caloric density, you will gain weight.
- Eat solid food with caloric densities less than 2. It's okay to eat solid food with caloric densities between 2 and 3, but go easy.
- Don't eat solid food with caloric densities greater than 3.
- Don't drink liquids with caloric densities greater than 0.4.
- Use common sense.

So what is caloric density?

It is the number of calories in the food divided by the weight of the food. For example, chocolate pudding has a caloric density of 1.3. (1/3 cup contains 150 calories and weighs 113 grams). An apple has a caloric density of 0.6. (1 apple contains 81 calories and weighs 142 grams).

Don't panic – you don't need to do the math! Brook has done it for you in the comprehensive charts that appear in his book.

It's easy to get the hang of the Golden Gate Diet. Vegetables, fruits, fish, skinless chicken all have low caloric density. Candy and snack foods have a high caloric density. The higher the number, the more fattening the food is.

The Golden Gate Diet provides you with delicious and healthy meal plans developed by Alise Arato, a young chef and food stylist from California. Alise is the daughter of Rona (Ronnie) Arato, an author of children's books who lives in Toronto.

There is a 1,200 calorie a day plan for losing weight and a 2,000 calorie plan for maintaining a low weight. Here are some of the wonderful menu offerings:

For breakfast, you can have egg white scramble with cream cheese, cream of wheat, berries, bananas, an apricot-pineapple smoothie, oatmeal, raisin bran, muesli cereal, french toast, waffles or pancakes (low-fat, of course)!

For lunch, you can have a turkey burner, pizza with nonfat mozzarella, tuna with mayo stuffed into tomato halves, curried chicken salad, a roast beef or turkey sandwich with arugula, roasted peppers and pesto mayo. You can enjoy spaghetti with chunky tomato sauce and cubed chicken, salmon salad with cucumber and herbs, a grilled portobello mushroom sandwich with roasted peppers, baby spinach and pesto. Try turkey and black bean chili or Moroccan sliced chicken breast salad with olives, figs and orange slices… yummy!

For dinner, you can have a braised veal chop, seared halibut kebabs, skinless barbecued chicken breast, zucchini lasagna with nonfat mozzarella, poached salmon with cucumber dill sauce, chicken vegetable stir-fry, low-fat turkey meatloaf or grilled turkey breast with roasted tomato salsa, even honey orange glazed salmon.

For dessert, you can have a piece of blueberry, cherry or lemon meringue pie, mixed berries with frozen yogurt, a red wine poached pear, grilled fruit kebab with honeyed yogurt, apple cinnamon crumble, roasted plums, pineapple grilled with lemon and honey, chocolate, vanilla or rice pudding, or angel food cake with half a sliced peach sprinkled with cinnamon.

My only complaint is that the Golden Gate Diet does not include recipes, which could always be added in a future edition. So I've included a couple of my own quick, delicious and healthy recipes from my book Healthy Helpings (Whitecap Books). Healthy Helpings replaces MealLeaniYumm! (no longer in print). I hope they help you in your quest for healthy recipes and help you lose weight in the process. Enjoy these simply delicious dishes that are perfect fare for summertime – or anytime!

CAJUN CHICKEN BREASTS

Source: Healthy Helpings by Norene Gilletz

Add a little spice to your life. Simply fantastic and so versatile!

4 boneless, skinless chicken breasts
1/2 tbsp. olive oil
2 tbsp. lemon juice
salt and freshly ground pepper, to taste
1/2 tsp. chili powder
1/2 tsp. paprika
1/2 tsp. cayenne
1/2 tsp. dried basil
2 cloves garlic crushed

Rinse chicken and pat dry. Trim off excess fat. Combine oil, lemon juice, seasonings and garlic in a mixing bowl. Add chicken and marinate for an hour at room temperature, or up to 24 hours covered in the refrigerator.

Preheat oven to 400. Remove chicken from marinade and arrange in a single layer on a foil-lined baking sheet. Pour marinade over and around chicken. Bake uncovered for 20 minutes, turning chicken pieces over at half time. Baste occasionally with pan juices. When done, chicken will be springy when lightly touched. If overcooked, chicken will be tough. Yield: 4 servings.

Fowl Play! Marinate a batch of chicken breasts, then freeze in meal-sized packages for up to a month. (Never do this with chicken that was previously frozen, then defrosted.) When needed, thaw chicken overnight in the refrigerator (or in the microwave), then cook as directed.

Grilled Cajun Chicken Breasts: Preheat barbecue or broiler. Marinate chicken as directed. Remove from marinade and pat dry. Grill or broil over medium to medium-high heat about 5 to 7 minutes on each side. Baste chicken frequently with marinade; don't overcook. Cooking time on the barbecue will be shorter than under the broiler because of the higher, direct heat. Cook chicken over heat, not flame, to prevent flare-ups!

MICROPOACHED SALMON FILLETS

Source: Healthy Helpings by Norene Gilletz

Other fish fillets (sole, roughy, snapper) can be used. Salmon is very high in Omega-3 fatty acids, which help fight heart disease. This recipe is so quick and scrumptious, it's no problem to cook fish two or three times a week.

iceberg or Romaine lettuce leaves
salt and pepper, to taste
1 tbsp. fresh lemon or lime juice
1 tbsp. fresh dill, minced (or 1 tsp. dried) additional dill and lemon slices, to garnish

Wash lettuce and shake off excess water. Arrange a layer of lettuce leaves in the bottom of a glass pie plate. Arrange fish in a single layer, with thicker edges of fish towards the outside edge of the dish. Season with salt, pepper and lemon juice; top with dill. Cover with another layer of lettuce.

Microwave fish on HIGH for 3 minutes. Rotate the plate 1/4 turn and cook fish 3 minutes longer. Fish should be even in colour. Let fish stand for 3 to 4 minutes. It should flake when lightly pressed. If undercooked, microwave 1 or 2 minutes more. Discard lettuce. Garnish salmon with fresh dill and thinly sliced lemon. Delicious hot or cold. Yield: 4 servings. Leftovers keep 2 or 3 days, or can be frozen.

Note: Instead of dill, vary the herbs used to season the fish (e.g., tarragon, parsley, basil, thyme or oregano). If using dried herbs, use 1/3 of the amount.

Iran's Jews live dual lives

By RACHEL SILVERMAN
JTA

NEW YORK — Iran wouldn't appear to be a likely candidate to house the largest Jewish community in the Muslim world.

After all, Iran is run by a fundamentalist Islamic regime whose president has threatened to destroy Israel and who regularly denies the Holocaust.

But President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's Iran currently is home to an estimated 25,000 Jews.

What is life – and Jewish life – like for these Iranian Jews? How do they reconcile their dual identities? And why do they choose to stay in a land that, at least from an outsider's perspective, appears increasingly inhospitable?

History, in part, holds the answer to these questions.

Iranian Jews have lived in the region for more than 2,700 years. During that time, they've survived waves of forced conversion, anti-Semitic propaganda, derogatory dress codes and economic, legal and social persecution.

But there have also been times when they flourished, as they did under the pro-western regime of Shah Mohammed Reza Pahlavi, who ruled until the Islamists took over in the late 1970s.

Through these ebbs and flows, Iranian Jews have learned that oppressors, no matter how tyrannical, are only temporary masters.

For this reason, as George Haroonian, a community activist in Los Angeles put it, Iranian Jews tend to think of the current anti-Semitic, anti-Israel climate as only "a temporary disruption in the long centuries of the relationship between Jews and Iranians."

"These people know this government will vanish, but Israel will stay and Iran will stay," Haroonian, who runs a magazine for Iranian Jewish émigrés, said. "We have to think of it in those terms."

For many Iranian Jews, that means making their peace and carrying on.

"Right now, the situation is like a calm before a storm," said Frank Nikbakht, the former public affairs director of the Council of Iranian American Jewish Organizations. "The problem is as long as the situation seems to be normal, it's very difficult to ask somebody to pack up and leave a country they've lived in for hundreds of generations."

But there have been occasional anti-Semitic outbursts during the past decade or so.

In 1999, 13 Iranian Jews were accused of spying for Israel, and 10 were imprisoned. Though all were released by 2002, the incident sent shock waves throughout Iran's Jewish community.

During that period, reports also rose about 11 others who went missing between 1994 and 1997. Haroonian said that Iranian American Jews are "very much still following the issue," since "the Iranian government has not given straight answers of what happened to these people."

In other ways, too, the situation for Iranian Jews is difficult.

Anti-Semitic propaganda is pervasive, say those interviewed for this article, and Jewish citizens have been stripped of many rights, such as their ability to provide testimony in court or hold a position superior to that of a Muslim.

Things have gotten so bad that several weeks ago, reports that Iran would be enacting a law mandating a Nazi-like uniform for Jews was widely believed in the West. That report, however, proved to be false.

Mahmoud Ahmadinejad

To cope with their lack of freedoms, Jews in Iran have mastered the art of separating their private lives from their public ones.

"In order to be as safe as possible, you must hide most of your feelings," Nikbakht said. "You keep a low profile and agree to the government position, whatever it is."

Haroonian concurred. "Many Jews have sort of accepted, internalized the idea of being inferior to the majority Muslims. It's the relationship of, 'You do your thing and I'll do my thing and we don't step over the lines.'"

When an Iranian Jewish dance troupe travelled to Russia recently, several members refused to eat pieces of cake decorated with the Israeli flag.

What happens inside those houses is another story, however.

In recent years, Jewish practice may have strengthened in Iran.

"Jews in Iran have become more religious since the revolution," confirmed Pooya Dayanim, president of the U.S.-based Iranian Jewish Public Affairs Committee. "As their numbers have dwindled, solidarity and action among them has increased."

He cited 13 active synagogues in the country, as well as a Jewish hospital and slew of Jewish day schools.

Nikbakht attributed this upswing to waning public entertainment, as well as a general trend toward religious extremism in the country.

"When you see the environment is doing something, you tend to do the same in order to say it's not only you who are close to God, it's us, too," he said.

Still, practising Judaism under the current regime has proved difficult.

State law forces Jewish schools to remain open on the Sabbath, and specifies that Hebrew lessons are not permitted outside prayer time.

Schools are required to have Muslim principals, since Jews must occupy subordinate positions at all times, and prayer books are printed in Farsi instead of Hebrew, as a means of controlling what is studied.

These obstacles, perhaps, also account for the slow trickle of Jews out of Iran.

The Hebrew Immigration Aid Society (HIAS) holds a contract with the U.S. State Department to operate an immigration center in Vienna, where Iranian Jews are detained until they can enter the U.S. Refugee Program and emigrate. Statistics provided by the organization show that about 200 Iranian Jews were resettled in 2004, and about 300 in 2005.

Haroonian reported that relatives in the United States are "giving messages to their families saying, 'Think about your future, the future of your young kids.' "

Many Jews in Iran are dismissive, he said.

"When they hear about assimilation and divorce rates here, and security issues in Israel, so many choose to stay," Haroonian said. "They think it's not very rosy here, either."

But Sam Kermanian, secretary-general of the Los Angeles-based Iranian Jewish Federation, pointed to other, more pragmatic reasons for staying put: Many are too old or too sick to leave.

"Those who remain to a large extent would have a more difficult time adjusting to life in a different country," he said.

He added that others may not have the financial means to leave.

But unless Iranian Jews speak up, agencies in a position to help them will continue to receive mixed messages.

"We certainly have noted with concern the flow of new stories of problems and statements by the government," Gideon Aronoff, president and CEO of HIAS, said. "But we really do leave it to the people on the ground to assess their own circumstances."

Nikbakht reiterated this claim.

"Most of the Jewish organizations outside the country have made it clear to relatives or co-reglionists in Iran that whenever they want to leave, the Jews outside the country are ready to help them," he said. "Beyond that, there is no large-scale, organized effort to get them out. All we're doing is telling them, if you want to get out, we're ready to help you."

The traditions of Iranian Jews

NEW YORK — Iranian Jews have long practised a unique brand of Judaism.

Because Jews in Iran have lived in relative isolation for hundreds of years, their Jewish practice doesn't fall into traditional categories such as Reform or Sephardi. Despite popular misconceptions, Iranian Jews neither speak the Arabic language nor identify with its culture.

In Iranian Jewish tradition, Shabbat dinners and holiday gatherings are large affairs, a practice that originated inside ghetto walls where everyone knew one another, and therefore all had to be invited. They are often celebrated with traditional Persian dishes such as rice-based stews, fresh fruits and a chicken soup called gondi.

Purim is a major landmark on the Iranian Jewish calendar because the story is said to have taken place in ancient Persia, which is today Iran. Celebrations include a 24-hour fast, megillah readings and desserts called halvah, made of flour or rice, sugar, oil and saffron.

Weddings are also large, elaborate processes. At one party, the groom asks the bride's family for permission to marry. In another, sweets are exchanged as a symbol of happiness. Other celebrations include a bathing ritual for bride and groom, a wedding shower for the bride, and a get-to-know-you session for extended family members.

But in Iranian Jewish practice, outwardly visible customs, such as wearing masks during Purim, take a back seat to more inwardly focused customs, such as family-centred events in the home. Because of fear of persecution, Jews in Iran traditionally do not give their children Hebrew names, nor do they pay membership dues to a synagogue.

'A very moving personal experience'

We held a fruitful discussion on the main issues on the agenda, mainly ways to advance negotiations between Israel and the Palestinian Authority [PA].

I see you, Mr. President, as a true partner in the effort to bring peace to our region. I intend to closely consult and work with you in order to advance the peace process. Your contribution is as vital as it was during the successful implementation of the Disengagement Plan.

I am very pleased by the co-operation between our countries in the struggle against global terrorism – a plague that strikes at innocent civilians. We have agreed to enhance co-operation and coordination between us and between our countries on this issue…

Israel is committed to the Road Map [peace plan] and to advancing the bilateral channel with Mahmoud Abbas, the elected chairman of the PA. My aspiration is to exhaust all avenues in order to advance this channel. I intend to meet with PA Chairman Abbas in order to encourage the process that will enable us to achieve progress in accordance with the Road Map [peace plan]. I discussed this of course with President Mubarak, who is the most experienced statesman in our region and is certainly the most experienced in contacts that could lead to peace agreements. I very much hope that the Palestinian partners will utilize this opportunity to implement all of their commitments in order to make it possible to move forward in accordance with the Road Map.

Of course, Israel expects that the Palestinian government will fully implement the demands of the Quartet [the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations] and the international community and thus make it possible to hold negotiations on the basis of the Road Map. We have not hidden our view that if this does not occur and that if we reach the conclusion that it will not occur, we will have no alternative but to look for other ways in order to move the situation in the Middle East and in order to prevent stalemate from taking over the reality in the Middle East.

We also discussed the humanitarian situation in the PA areas and we will take all measures in order to prevent a humanitarian crisis…

We also appreciate the humanitarian assistance that Egypt is providing to the Palestinians, which includes many trucks laden with food and medicines…

And lastly, permit me to take this opportunity to add something personal that is not in the written statement. Mr. President, this was a very moving personal experience for me to sit with you now for approximately 1.5 hours, to hold talks and to listen to one of the most experienced and important leaders that I have had the opportunity of meeting with.

Bilateral relations between Israel and Egypt are very fundamental and very important to our worldview and to the network of relations that we want to build in the region, and the leadership of Hosni Mubarak is an important key to the success of this process…

CanWest loses JPost ownership claim

Jerusalem Post

NEW YORK — Canadian media group CanWest Global Communications Corp. has lost a legal battle to acquire 50 per cent ownership of the Jerusalem Post.

At the end of a protracted process, a New York-based arbitrator on June 1 denied all CanWest claims to ownership in the Post and further ordered CanWest to pay costs, expenses and attorneys' fees incurred by the Israeli owners of the Post, Mirkaei Tikshoret, during the legal dispute.

The arbitrator ruled that Mirkaei Tikshoret Limited, the Mirkaei Tikshoret Group (MTG) and its owner Eli Azur were the "prevailing parties in this arbitration" and denied "all of the claims" submitted by CanWest.

When the sale of the Post by previous owners Hollinger was announced in late 2004, it was stated that CanWest and Mirkaei Tikshoret would jointly own the Post and pay $13.2 million for it.

But Geoffrey Elliot, vice president of corporate affairs at CanWest, said June 1 that after MTG acquired the paper, talks between it and CanWest failed to complete what would have been the second phase of the deal under which CanWest would have bought half of the Post. The case then went to arbitration at the International Center for Dispute Resolution in New York, Elliot said in a statement.

CanWest asserted that Azur breached his obligations under a deal to jointly acquire the Post and related media businesses. Azur argued in defense that the parties had never reached a binding agreement.

CanWest announced over the weekend that it was reviewing the arbitrator's decision and considering its options.

"We find it very difficult to reconcile the apparent inconsistency in the arbitrator's findings," Asper said.

"On the one hand, the arbitrator found that MTG refused to accept the fundamental tenet of the agreement which provided for the parties to each own an equal interest in the newspaper, but somehow concluded that this did not constitute a breach of the agreement to negotiate with us in good faith," he added.

Mirkaei Tikshoret had no official comment.

Israel Briefs

Hezbollah warned

Lebanon and Hezbollah will pay a "heavy price," senior Israeli army officers warned last week, if the Iranian-funded group fails to learn its lesson from Israel's massive retaliatory raids last month and launches additional attacks against northern Israel. "We hope the message from our response was understood correctly by the other side [Hezbollah]," Galilee commander Brig.-Gen. Gal Hirsch told reporters as a tense quiet prevailed in the north after rockets flew over both sides of the border. "If… violence recurs, we will know how to retaliate even stronger," he added. "We are ready for another day of fighting if it comes to that."

Jerusalem City Hall fined

The Jerusalem District Court has ordered the Jerusalem Municipality to pay the city's Gay and Lesbian Center NIS 350,000 for "cultural and social activities" held by the organization over the last three years. The decision came in the wake of a petition submitted by the centre against the city, which, since 2003, had stopped allocating funds to the group out of its small cultural activities budget. "Even if municipal officials have a hard time accepting the gay community, and believe this [community] is an unwanted phenomenon, the municipality cannot swerve from fundamental principles and ignore this community," Judge Yehudit Tzur wrote in her ruling, accepting the petitioners' argument the city was discriminating against them.

Israel, NATO ties upgraded

A desire to improve the ability of countries to work together against terrorism and in efforts to prevent Iran from obtaining nuclear power prompted NATO to upgrade Israel's status in the military alliance and to invite the Israeli Navy to participate, for the first time, in a joint exercise, a high-ranking Israeli Navy officer told the Jerusalem Post. Israelis have taken part in NATO exercises as observers, but not on a tactical level. Eight NATO warships docked in Haifa last week. The goal was to familiarize Israel with NATO capabilities and discuss the "Co-operation Mako" exercise to take place this month in the Black Sea, said Brig.-Gen. Yohai Ben-Yosef, commander of the Haifa naval base.

Israel backs U.S. on Iran

Israel endorsed a direct overture by the United States to Iran on ending the nuclear standoff. U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, in a major policy shift, said the United States would be willing to join European powers in negotiating with Iran if it abandons its uranium enrichment program. Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni said Rice told her about the initiative beforehand. "Israel appreciates the steps and measures by the United States in continuing to lead the international coalition and in taking all necessary steps to prevent Iran from gaining nuclear capability," Livni said in a statement. "Israel supports the efforts of the United States on this matter."

Ecosystem found in cave

A prehistoric ecosystem was discovered in an Israeli cave. Hebrew University scientists announced the discovery of eight previously unknown species of animal life in a cave uncovered by accident during a quarry dig near Ramle. The cave is believed to have been sealed off from the outside world for millions of years. The animals, crustaceans and invertebrates similar to scorpions, had no eyes, which scientists attributed to their evolution in a dark environment.

Outposts coming down

The Defence Ministry is drafting plans to evacuate the 24 outposts Israel has promised the United States it will remove. A ministry source told the Jerusalem Post the evacuation plan had yet to be completed or formally approved, and that no date had been set for the removal of the unauthorized outposts, constructed after former prime minister Ariel Sharon took office in March 2001. Talks with the settlers about the outposts' fate are ongoing.

British Jews voice outrage at academic boycott vote

By VANESSA BULKACZ
JTA

LONDON — British Jewish leaders and students are blasting a decision by a British teachers union to recommend a boycott of Israeli academics.

The May 29 vote by the National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education, which forces Israeli academics to "publicly declare their political views and subject them to the scrutiny of British academics, is especially pernicious," the Board of Deputies of British Jews said in a statement.

The boycott applies to Israeli lecturers and academic institutions that don't publicly declare their opposition to Israel's presence in the West Bank.

The boycott has sparked international outrage among pro-Israel scholars and Jewish groups for being both one-sided and counterproductive, even though its practical ramifications seem limited.

The resolution is being seen as largely symbolic, since it only "invites members to consider their responsibility" instead of enforcing a boycott.

Trevor Phillips, press spokesperson for the association, told JTA, "The resolution is not a union boycott. It is a matter for personal consideration. It was meant only to open up a debate about this topic and encourage members to think about their own responsibility in the issue."

Further, the vote could soon be moot, since the association is set to merge with the Association of University Teachers, which voted to boycott Israeli academics last year because of Israeli policy toward the Palestinians, but rescinded the decision in the face of international criticism.

After the merger of the two unions, which will form the largest higher education union in the world, the resolution would need to be re-approved to become effective.

The Association of University Teachers responded to the May 29 vote by issuing a statement saying it does not endorse the policy and as "strongly advising members not to implement it."

Nonetheless, opponents of the boycott resolution were outraged at its passage and expressed hope that it would be rescinded.

The chief executive of the Board of Deputies, Jon Benjamin, decried the motion as "a policy that no one in academia should countenance."

Ronnie Fraser, an association delegate and the chairman of Academic Friends of Israel, an organization formed in 2002 to fight the academic boycott of Israel, said he is "not happy at all" with this outcome.

Fraser said that academics at 30 of Britain's 100 universities work with Israeli colleagues.

The vote occurred amid a flurry of protest from academics both in Britain and abroad, as well as lawmakers in the Israeli Knesset who convened an emergency meeting to discuss the proposed boycott, which they described as a "witch hunt."

Israel's education minister, Yuli Tamir, unsuccessfully called on the British government to intervene before the vote.

The Guardian printed a letter issued by Engage, an academic group that was formed last year to fight the boycott, signed by approximately 600 academics around the world who oppose the Israeli occupation of the West Bank.

The letter opposed "the inconsistency of blacklisting Israelis" while "adopting a different attitude to academics in the long list of other states that are responsible for equal or worse human rights abuses."

Before the vote, more than 4,700 international academics also signed an online petition, organized by the Israeli-led International Advisory Board for Academic Freedom.

The petition states: "Academic boycott actions are antithetical not only to principles of academic freedom but also to the quest for peaceful resolution of the Arab-Israeli conflict."

After the vote, the chairman of the advisory board, Yosef Yeshurun, provost of Bar-Ilan University, said it was "unfortunate" that the British group "decided to adopt a negative approach, seeking to burn bridges instead of building them."

The British resolution called on the 69,000-member association "to consider the appropriateness of a boycott of those that do not publicly dissociate themselves" from "Israeli apartheid policies."

This part of the resolution passed narrowly, with just 53.5 per cent of the vote.

Two other paragraphs of the same motion, including those that criticize "Israeli apartheid policies, including construction of the exclusion wall, and discriminatory educational practices" and "invite members to consider their own responsibility for ensuring equity and non-discrimination in contacts with Israeli educational institutions or individuals" passed more easily by a show of hands.

The resolution was supported by the Federation of Unions of Palestinian University Professors and Employees, who lauded the boycott as a "courageous initiative."

The British Committee for Universities of Palestine, which was set up "in response to a Palestinian call for a boycott," welcomed the vote, stating that the motion's passage "proves that many academics in the U.K. and beyond do not buy the disingenuous claim that boycott of Israeli academic institutions conflicts with 'academic freedom' or inadvertently promotes anti-Semitism in any way."

Jewish student groups in Britain, meanwhile, expressed concern about the ramifications on campus. Mitch Simmons, campaign director of the Union of Jewish Students of Britain, said, "Israeli and Jewish students cannot be made to feel victimized or excluded due to their nationality or political beliefs."

"This boycott will only help to cement divisions on campus," he said.

Birthright israel hits a magic number

By CHANAN TIGAY
JTA

NEW YORK — Birthright israel could do a heck of a lot worse than Stephanie Lowenthal as the 100,000th participant on the group's free, 10-day, identity-building trips to Israel.

The 26-year-old New Yorker is attractive, eloquent and poised – and, as was evident during a news conference last week, she'll do well as birthright's public face when the organization celebrates this milestone this week in Israel.

"Planning a trip to Israel has been something I've wanted to do my whole life, but it has not been feasible until now," said Lowenthal, who works in communications for the NASDAQ Stock Market.

She didn't grow up particularly observant, though she had a bat mitzvah and her family is "pretty Conservative," she said. Lowenthal hasn't served as a leader in any Jewish group and, significantly, she's never been to Israel.

All of this, birthright officials say, means Lowenthal's background is a fairly accurate representation of many of the program participants.

Had Lowenthal waited any longer to sign up, she would not have been able to secure a spot on a birthright trip at all. That's because the trip is for Jews aged 18 to 26 – and Lowenthal just makes the cutoff.

And while she did end up finding a place on this month's trip – and an auspicious place to boot – thousands of other young Jewish adults today find themselves on birthright's growing waiting list.

The waiting list, which birthright officials say numbers around 30,000 people, is a testament to the program's popularity and success. But it's also indicative of the group's struggle to find sufficient funding for everyone who wants to go before it's too late.

Stephanie Lowenthal

"We have to get a lot bigger quicker if we hope to stem the tide" of declining Jewish identity in the Diaspora, said Michael Steinhardt, a founder and funder of the six-year-old program.

According to a 2004 study by independent researchers at Brandeis University, birthright, launched late in 1999 as a five-year pilot project, makes a profound impact on participants' Jewish identities. Many become active in their schools' Hillels when they return to campus. Some go into Jewish prpfessional life and between 4,000 and 5,000 of the participants from around the world now live in Israel, officials say.

Last year, in an effort to ensure its sustainability, broaden its base of financial support and accommodate the explosion in the number of Jewish young adults interested in taking part, birthright founded the birthright israel Foundation.

About 14 months later, birthright officials say that the foundation has made some significant strides – and still has a long way to go.

The foundation changed the way birthright raised money. In its first five years, the program relied on a relatively small number of donors making large gifts. Now the foundation has made an effort to draw in many more donors at lower levels, in addition to big gifts.

Between January and April of this year, the number of gifts to birthright under $50,000 (all figures are US) was four times the number from the same period the previous year, adding up to somewhere in the mid-six figures, the foundation's president, Jay Golan, told JTA.

"I see a very strong broadening out of the support base of this," he said. "I'm really pleased. People do seem to be very enthusiastic about the opportunity to give to birthright. Many people just simply didn't know."

A multilingual revelation

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

When Yakov Yavno takes to the stage and performs his captivating one-man show, Revelation, he artfully embodies the Jewish Diaspora experience.

Singing tunes in as many as a half dozen languages, Yavno's musical program explores the richness of Jewish culture and traditions and the common bond that unites all Jews.

"There are Jewish people living all over this world in different countries speaking different languages," Yavno related in a recent interview with The CJN from his New York home.

"I sing in many of these languages and the idea is to show that it doesn't matter what language we use – we can all understand each other… We can find common ground."

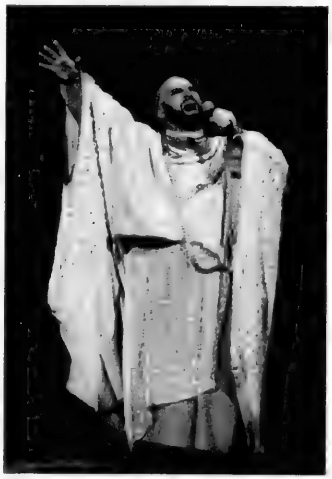
Yavno's powerful bass-baritone will be showcased in Toronto on June 28, when the revered singer and actor performs his solo show at Leah Posluns Theatre.

The concert will feature Yavno's new versions of classics in English, Hebrew, Yiddish, Spanish, Italian and Russian.

"With many Jewish songs, I have my own version, which is my way to find and bring something new and fresh to old songs," he explained.

"When you hear my presentation of these songs, you will understand completely that I am an artist from Russia who at the same time is open to the world."

Born in Minsk, Belarus, Yavno was raised in a musical family and received formal training at the highly regarded Gnesin Academy of Music.



Yakov Yavno

The singer is also an acclaimed actor, honing the craft of performance arts at the Jewish Musical Chamber Theatre in Moscow.

He garnered fame in the Soviet Union, winning a prestigious government award for his portrayal of Tevya, the main character from Fiddler on the Roof.

Following the fall of communism, Yavno, like many other Jews from the former Soviet Union, emigrated to the United States in 1990.

He spent several years training to be a cantor at the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York, but decided being a chazzan was not the right path.

"I made the decision to stop and it was a very hard time for me," he recalled.

"Irene helped me understand the world," he enthused.

Along his journey, Yavno has recorded three albums and has appeared in productions with such stars as Vanessa Redgrave, Raul Julia and the late Christopher Reeve.

He's also performed on world renowned stages, including Carnegie Hall, the National Opera House in Tel Aviv and the Bolshoi Theatre.

"This will be the first time I'm in Toronto where I'll speak with the audience in English," he said.

"I'm looking forward to going to Canada and sharing with the audience, not just my voice, but my experience."

A dull and pretentious film from Amos Gitai

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Film festival programmers often turn to Amos Gitai as their Israeli director of choice, probably because his movies are serious, generally topical and imbued with a left-of-centre perspective and sensibility.

Shot in Israel and Jordan, Free Zone is broadly about self-identity and Israel's perennial conflict with the Arabs, themes that Gitai has touched upon in films ranging from In Search of Identity and Wadi to Kippur and Kedma.

In Free Zone, starring the actresses Natalie Portman and Hanna Laslo, two women drive from Israel to Jordan for a meeting with a mysterious man known as the American.

Although they intend to spend less than a day in Jordan, they are carrying far too many suitcases for so short a visit. Strangely enough, their baggage does not arouse the suspicion of the Jordanian border guard, who lets them through without any fuss.

As they drive deeper into Jordan, toward a free trade area where Israelis and Arabs can rub shoulders, Rebecca and Hanna reflect on their lives.

Rebecca, an American of half Jewish descent who speaks in a mixture of English and Hebrew, feels detached from everything. But her alienation goes unexplained.

Hanna, an Israeli, talks about her husband, who once cultivated flowers in the Negev Desert and in Yamit, a settlement in the Sinai Peninsula Israel gave up after its 1979 peace treaty with Egypt. Later, she explains that her husband has prospered in the armoured car manufacturing business because war is the only "constant" in Israel.

These references to contemporary Israel are complemented by allusions to the Palestinian refugee problem.

When the two women stop for gas in Jerash, they chat with a man whose family lived in Jaffa until the 1948 Arab-Israeli war.

Two-thirds of the way into the film, a viewer learns the purpose of Hanna's mission: to collect a $30,000 debt from the American.

At this point, a third woman, a Palestinian named Leila (Hiam Abbas), enters the picture. Leila, too, has a connection with the American, but it remains murky, like Free Zone itself.

To put it generously, this is not Gitai's finest moment as a filmmaker. Free Zone is dull, deadly and pretentious and, in some instances, seemingly pointless.

Play portrays Golda Meir as living in perpetual conflict

By SHIRA SCHWARTZ
Special to The CJN

Valerie Harper

Sometimes matzah ball soup just isn't enough, even for a Jewish mother. In Golda's Balcony, Golda Meir declares that she will neither be locked up in a kitchen to make matzah balls nor will her entire life be a bargain for two chicken bones.

In this one-woman show written by William Gibson and directed by Scott Schwartz (it was on at the Elgin Theatre until May 28), Valerie Harper, famous for her role as Rhoda Morgenstern on The Mary Tyler Moore Show in the 1970s, plays Golda Meir during the Yom Kippur War, as well as an impressive 44 other roles including various family members, political figures and other important members of the Israeli government.

Harper's characters include her version of Israel's first prime minister, David Ben-Gurion, and King Abdullah of Jordan (both are quite visually and vocally entertaining); however the most engaging is Golda Meir herself: as a woman, wife and mother.

While the story of the Yom Kippur War is indeed compelling, it is not one audiences haven't heard before. Golda's political struggle as prime minister, no matter how animated or theatrical the performance, pales in comparison to her personal struggle as a woman trying to simultaneously embrace and escape from her domestic life.

Golda lives in perpetual conflict, torn between her family and political lives, which continually seem to stand in opposition to each other. Never satisfied with either, she continues throughout her life to deny one life in pursuit of the other, and grows increasingly frustrated as she realizes that both are equally important to her and yet cannot be harmonized.

As acting prime minister, she neglects her family, and for this is left miserable and dissatisfied. As a mother and housewife, she neglects her country, and for this is left miserable and dissatisfied. It is the unveiling of this paradox that illuminates the audience's understanding of Golda and her sense of "duty." Near the end of the play, Golda compares herself to one of Pavlov's dogs: you say "duty" and Golda salivates. This clever formulation points precisely to the play's driving question: duty toward what? Her country? Her family? Or herself?

While Gibson should be applauded for raising these questions and for presenting this dichotomy, I suspect that this may be an over-analysis to some degree and that Golda's inner struggle was not necessarily meant to be the focus of the play. This leads to the play's major flaw: lack of clarity of conflict. It is unclear what the real "meat" is in such a cholent of a play – is it Golda Meir's life story? The hidden complexities of the Israeli government? The Yom Kippur War?

A number of theatrical techniques that point to male-female/ social-political dichotomies and that may indicate that the play is about Golda's war against herself are used. For example, the use of shadows emphasize Golda's double personality, stacks of documents set beside a tea kettle centre-stage emphasize Golda's contrasting duties as prime minister and mother, and the recurring ticking sound is the female "biological clock."

It is not convincing, however, that these are not all merely side dishes to the play's main course, the nature of which is unclear. It also doesn't help that Harper's performance, though in many ways impressive, shows very little vocal and emotional range. Because there is so little variation of tone, her emotional commitment almost goes to waste, because nothing advances or transforms her emotion, leaving it static throughout the play.

In spite of this, Golda's Balcony raises relevant issues regarding the pursuit of political, social and personal freedom and independence, led by an example of one strong and relentless woman who swore she would never disappear behind kitchen doors as a subservient housewife. Golda Meir never did beg for bones, not even two chicken bones. One only wonders who made her children chicken soup when they were sick.

WILLIAM SHATNER LAUNCHES ISRAELI CHARITY

Montreal-born actor William Shatner of Star Trek fame beamed down to Israel last week to help launch a new Jewish National Fund-sponsored program that helps children with disabilities through horseback riding.

Shatner, best known for his portrayal of Captain Kirk in Star Trek and later for his roles in The Practice and Boston Legal, met with Israeli tourism minister Isaac Herzog in Jerusalem to publicize the consortium. He hopes to raise US $10 million to establish nearly 30 riding programs across the country.

The actor has been involved with Ahead With Horses, a Los Angeles charity that also works with physically and developmentally disabled children through horseback riding. "We know that the use of a horse in their therapy takes them beyond their handicapped body, their injured body, and into another area of health."

Truth and Reconciliation: Manfred Becker wasn't happy that his 13-year-old son was taunted at school because of his German parenthood. The Toronto-based filmmaker said he found a supreme irony in the fact that "my son is called a Nazi because of what my father's generation did."

The incident propelled him on a journey back to Germany, where he found his country torn between denial, reckoning and reconciliation. His documentary, Fatherland, is a personal quest to understand his own father, his young son and himself – "three generations caught on the wrong side of history."

Fatherland was featured in the recent Hot Docs festival. It airs on History Television, June 17, 7 p.m. and June 23, 9 p.m.

Names in the News: Invited to give a sermon last Easter in the famed medieval Notre Dame Cathedral of Paris, 85-year-old French poet Claude Vigée became the first Jew ever to have done so, he afterwards asserted. Vigée spoke to the throng of 2,000 churchgoers on the topic of Joseph and the children of Israel in Egypt, and later claimed to be the first ever to recite Biblical passages in Hebrew in a sermon there.

Born in the Alsace region, Vigée taught at American universities after the war, then lived with his family in Israel for 40 years. Five years ago, he moved back to France because his wife needed specialized medical treatment. In a recent interview in the London Jewish Chronicle, he expressed regret at leaving Israel, but said it had been necessary. "As Solomon wrote in his proverbs, 'A live dog is worth more than a dead lion,'" he quipped.

A prolific writer well known in the French-speaking world, Vigée's recent books include La Lutte avec L'Ange and Danser vers L'abime.

On an Island with Paul Gellman

By JENNA ROSMAN
CJN Intern

Paul Gellman has been creating music for 30 years, and has been a musician even longer.

On May 31, the 53-year-old performed at downtown club Hugh'sroom, playing songs from his debut studio album On This Island, released in June last year.

"We played Massey Hall and nice concert halls throughout the country," said Gellman, who dropped out of the University of Toronto at 18 to pursue music full time. "We did tours all over Ontario and the West Coast. We went to Europe once. We recorded [an album] in Germany. To me, that was university – I call it the university of Perth County."

This makes sense for someone who has been playing music for most of his life. Gellman studied piano and violin at the Royal Conservatory of Music of Toronto from the age of six until he was 15. Growing up, he was also active in Beth Tzedek's Junior Congregation's cantor club.

By the time Gellman joined Perth County Conspiracy, where he was a fiddler and keyboardist, he had already played in several bands, mostly in British Columbia, where he lived for a time.

Gellman's claim to fame with Perth County Conspiracy came by chance, after a friend suggested the avid fan approach Perth County Conspiracy guitarist and vocalist Richard Keelan, to express his appreciation.

"[Keelan] was really my favourite guy and my main inspiration. He had an unusual musical style – more the spiritual feeling to his music – and it was really interesting," Gellman said. "The next time I went to visit Toronto, I went up to Stratford, I found him and said, 'Richard, you have really inspired me forever and I'd like nothing better than to jam with you.' And we jammed together, and I actually played the fiddle."

Gellman quit Perth County Conspiracy a year later.

"I had my own vision [of] what I wanted to do with my own music and I didn't have as much opportunity to do it there, because I was the side man and was supporting everyone else," he said. "I didn't have real opportunity to explore my own music."

At that time, Gellman went back to live in British Columbia, taking with him bassist David Woodhead and drummer Jerome Jarvis, and they formed the band Island.

"We all played a lot of different instruments. We had that band for about three years. We developed a nice little following, but not as well as Perth County Conspiracy."

Gellman describes Island's music as "funk with overtones of jazz and rock," and political.

In December 1976, Gellman met met the late Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach, at the World Symposium on Humanity in Vancouver, an event that featured a diversity of spiritual leaders. Rabbi Carlebach performed his music before the crowd of several thousands.

"He delivered a performance which was so inspirational to me. He got everyone crying and hugging and jumping up and down. The event wasn't just for Jewish people, it was for everybody. He brought people together. He broke down all the walls. I was so impressed with that. He used music to do it, so I could obviously relate to that," Gellman said. "He came from a long line of rabbis from Germany, so he had a real legacy. At the same time, he wanted to reach out to people who weren't Orthodox. He didn't need you to be Orthodox, he wanted you to love being Jewish. He wanted to express his love of Judaism through music, stories and Torah to everybody."

"I wasn't really connected to being Jewish, so I was dabbling with Hindu and Buddhist stuff, like many of my generation. We looked East, because we missed out in the Jewish upbringing. We felt there wasn't as much of a mystical experience [there]," he said.

"I was experiencing mystical things through meditation, yoga and more eastern philosophy. [When] I met Rabbi Carlebach, he made me realize that there was just as much mysticism in Judaism."

Gellman helped Rabbi Carlebach promote his concerts.

As Gellman's exposure to Judaism broadened, he began adding Jewish songs to his repertoire. He is now part of a klezmer and Hebrew band called The Nigunatics, which he formed with other congregants of the Reconstructionist synagogue, Darchei Noam.

"We have one member who is a virtuoso recorder player," he said. "He has about seven different recorders that he plays and he knows all of the klezmer stuff. He has books of klezmer music and would teach us the klezmer tunes. I'd play the piano or the fiddle."

Gellman recently wrote a song about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict called Judea.

"It's about how Palestinians and Israelis are cousins and there is a wall between them," he said. "And when are we going to break down that wall? When are we going to be together?"

Jazz singer relaunches career after 15-year hiatus

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

June Garber is a mature, vivacious, animated silver-blond and a talented, sought-after jazz singer who doesn't let age stand in her way.

"I can continue fulfilling my dreams even though I am not 18 years old," she says.

Garber, whose single Someone made it to the Top 10 of the Canadian RPM charts, took a hiatus from singing in 1988 and returned to the music scene in 2003. Recently, she released her debut CD, Smile.

Certainly, she now has a great deal to smile about. The CD and her recent live performances have received rave reviews.

This past year, she has performed 83 times, with big bands and jazz ensembles, at clubs and festivals throughout Ontario.

This summer, Garber sings at Toronto's Distillery District, the Beaches International Jazz Festival, the Markham Jazz Festival and the Toronto Downtown Jazz Festival at Nathan Phillips Square.

"I am delighted that I feel young and vital and this summer is packed with jazz festivals and concerts," she says.

June Garber

Garber says that since childhood she dreamed of becoming a jazz singer, "but life always got in my way, such as a discouraging parent, marriage and a divorce."

Garber was born in Johannesburg, South Africa in 1949. Her father was considered one of the country's best jazz drummers.

"He was killed in a commercial plane crash when I was three years old. I know he would have encouraged me with my music, but my mother insisted that I become a teacher," she says.

At university, she studied drama and had a number of roles in productions, but she was persuaded to dismiss her acting aspirations. She taught for several years and married her best friend, she says. She also began singing in the evenings and on school holidays.

Historian plumbs depths of Islamic imperialist ambitions

Islamic Imperialism: A History* by Ephraim Karsh, Yale University Press.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Ephraim Karsh, a University of London professor specializing in Mediterranean studies, claims in Islamic Imperialism: A History that the quest for universal mastery lies at the heart of Islam, the world's fastest growing religion.

"Islam envisages a global political order in which all humankind will live under Muslim rule as either believers or subject communities," he writes in this bold, new book, published by Yale University Press.

In a sweeping survey in which he charts Muslim conquests from central Asia to Europe, Karsh ends his narrative on a sober note.

Arab terrorist attacks on the United States on Sept. 11, 2001, he writes, were motivated by Islamic imperialist aspirations rather than by rage over Washington's foreign policy in the Mideast.

Karsh's thesis, which will be hotly disputed, holds that the co-ordinated attacks against the World Trade Center and the Pentagon were in fact a reaction to the United States' preeminent position as a power capable of blocking Arab/Islamic expansion.

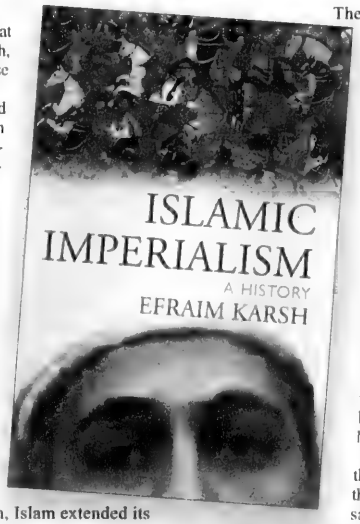
As he puts it in this intriguing though controversial volume, "Osama bin Laden and other Islamists' war is not against America per se but is rather the most recent manifestation of the millenarian jihad for [an] Islamic empire."

In general, Karsh makes a compelling case for his claim that the story of Islam has been the story of empires won and lost. Indeed, he quotes chapter and verse to prove it. Yet a discerning reader may question his tendency to minimize historical Muslim grievances over western encroachments into the Middle East. Despite this weakness, Islamic Imperialism is a fairly strong book.

If you're wary of Karsh's argument that Islam's raison d'etre is spreading the faith, by force or by demography, consider these telling quotations.

In a homily, the Prophet Muhammad observed, "I was ordered to fight all men until they say, 'There is no god but Allah.'" Saladin, the legendary Kurdish-fighter, declared, "I shall cross this sea … until there remains no one on the face of the earth who does not acknowledge Allah." Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, the godfather of Iran's Islamic revolution, said, "We will export our revolution… until the calls 'there is no god but Allah'… are echoed all over the world." Bin Laden, the founder of Al Qaeda, said, "I was ordered to fight the people until they say there is no god but Allah."

Karsh contends that the Prophet Muhammad transformed Islam from a purely Arab creed into a universal religion unbound by territorial or national boundaries.



Burning with religious messianism, Islam extended its domain into central Asia and much of the Indian subcontinent by the eighth century.

"Whether the conquests were an opportunistic magnified offshoot of small raiding parties or a product of a preconceived expansionist plan is immaterial," he writes. "Empires are born by chance as well as design."

Claiming that an Arab military caste forged an Islamic empire for the benefit of themselves, Karsh says that its imperial centre of gravity shifted to Baghdad under the Abbasid dynasty.

The Abbasids occupied Egypt and pushed into the Fertile Crescent, capturing Palestine and Syria and then the Arabian cities of Mecca and Medina.

Karsh's analysis of the Arab occupation of Spain – which ushered in an age of political, economic and cultural greatness where Jews flourished – is quite interesting. In the Middle East and north Africa, the vast majority of the subject peoples converted to Islam, but in Spain, they usually remained loyal to Christianity. This, of course, sowed the seeds of the Christian reconquest of Spain.

No book about Islam's imperial impulse would be complete without a discussion of the relatively short-lived Crusader states in the Middle East.

Karsh deals with this topic in thorough fashion, reminding us that the Mamluks destroyed the last Crusader stronghold in 1291. But his suggestion that these Frankish principalties were largely alienated from their European roots and thus no longer at the service of Christian imperialism is debatable.

In a fascinating chapter, Karsh cites the Ottoman Empire as an exemplar of Islamic expansionism. The Ottomans, having captured Sofia and Constantinople in the 14th and 15th centuries, established an empire stretching from the Black Sea to the gates of Vienna. But no sooner had the Ottomans reached their apogee than they went into a prolonged and steady decline.

Karsh ascribes their participation in World War I as Germany's ally to their desire to redress these setbacks. But having bet on the wrong horse, the Ottomans lost their grip on what remained of their Middle East outposts.

A constellation of Arab states, from Syria, Iraq and Jordan, emerged after the Ottomans' downfall in 1918. But even during this unsettled period, dreams of empire consumed Arab leaders, Karsh says.

The Jewish national movement, commonly known as Zionism, was regarded by the Arabs as a dire threat. But the Arab invasion of Israel in 1948, proclaimed as a stellar example of pan-Arab solidarity, was actually "a wholesale scramble for Palestine in the classic imperialist tradition."

According to Karsh, Arab states would have divided up Palestine among themselves had they defeated Israel in the war. "Arab regimes [did not] view the Palestinians as a distinct nation and most of them had their own designs on this territory."

In a harsh indictment of pan-Arabism, Karsh claims that it has been a euphemism for "the imperialist ambitions of successive Arab dynasties and rulers." He says that Gamal Abdel Nasser, Egypt's supreme leader from 1954 to '70, was a true imperialist whose 1958 union with Syria was little more than "a stepping-stone" toward Egyptian domination of the Middle East.

Nasser's legacy did not last long. His underestimated successor, Anwar Sadat, excoriated his predecessor for having made Egypt subservient to the Soviet Union.

Karsh also takes aim at the current breed of Islamic fundamentalists who, he notes, model themselves after Islam's earliest conquerors.

He argues that Hamas has subordinated its goal of eliminating Israel to the wider objective of creating a pan-Arabic or pan-Islamic state.

This is open to dispute. There are Hamas figures who may conform to this model, but most are deeply preoccupied with building an Islamic-oriented Palestinian state.

Q. It seems there are now so many different claims on packages saying "trans fat free." Do they all mean the same thing?

A. Many of the claims are misleading. I have written in previous articles about the importance of reading the ingredient labels to determine the presence of hydrogenated fats, shortening and palm and coconut oil. Manufacturers can manipulate the serving size on the nutrition information panel to reflect that the item has less than 0.5 grams of trans fat per serving. This allows for a trans-fat-free claim, even though several servings are likely to be eaten.

Also, remember to watch saturated fat content. Many companies are reducing or removing trans fat but increasing saturated fat or sugar for flavour. Also, remember that ingredients are listed in the order of volume in the food, so when a fat or sugar or salt is high up on the list, you may want to reconsider.

The bottom line – don't assume that food that claims to be zero trans fat is heart healthy. You still need to read the back or side of the box. The good news is that many companies have responsibly made their products healthier. I applaud those manufacturers for taking the high road to our better health.

Q. I would like to start taking a multivitamin and have no idea what to look for in one. I am a 41-year-old woman. Can you help? I notice that many vitamins say they are for women, men, seniors, etc. Is this just a way to get us to buy more or is it really necessary?

A. There are very good reasons for making separate vitamins for men and women and for people over 50. For example, premenopausal women require some iron in their multi-vitamin, while men and postmenopausal women do not.

When choosing a multi-vitamin, remember that too much of a vitamin can be far worse than too little. Mega-doses of vitamins can be harmful or toxic. Watch out for hefty doses of vitamins. Limit vitamin A to a maximum of 4000 IU and limit vitamin E to a maximum of 100 IU.

A multi-vitamin with about 15 milligrams of iron, about 0.6 milligrams of folic acid and magnesium (which helps absorb calcium) is recommended for premenopausal women. Look for one with 50 to 100 milligrams of magnesium. You also need vitamin B12 (6 milligrams), as well as minerals such as chromium, copper, selenium and zinc. You do not require more than 60 milligrams of vitamin C, the maximum the body can absorb.

Consider the strength of the tablet and how many you need to take in one day. Most people prefer one a day because it's easy to remember to take, but it's fine to skip a day, too. No-name brands or store brands of multi-vitamins are as good if not better, and cheaper, than name brands.

Remember that vitamins do not replace a healthy diet. It is good to include them to give you whatever may be lacking in your diet. However, you still need to eat a wide variety of healthy foods including lean protein, brightly coloured fruits and vegetables, whole grains, legumes and dairy (three servings a day) to achieve optimal nutrition.

Also, if your physician has prescribed a calcium or iron supplement or any other for you, you cannot likely get that from a multi-vitamin alone. If you need a separate supplement, ask your doctor or a pharmacist about combining the supplement with a multi-vitamin to avoid overdosing on vitamins.

Lisa Weinberg is a registered dietitian/nutritionist in Toronto, in private practice and at the Genesis Professional Group. If you have any nutrition questions, please send them to The CJN.

Husband has been ardent supporter

In 1975, Garber and her husband moved to Toronto. She formed an eight-piece band and toured Canada and the United States, from Las Vegas to Atlantic City, for eight years. In Toronto, she performed at the Constellation Hotel.

"It was a time of bad news and good news," she says.

Along with having a single on the charts, she was getting favourable press. "Garber sets the stage on fire," one reviewer said. The "bad news" was that her marriage came to an end in 1980.

But "it was also the beginning of a Cinderella love affair that began at a midnight performance at the hotel and has lasted for 26 years of marriage," she says.

For 10 years after her second marriage, she successfully pursued a career in theatre, but then she changed direction. "Travelling and loneliness led me to the decision to remain home and join Bob in his graduation-ring business," she says.

But encouraged by her husband, Garber came back to singing and began working with medium-size ensembles and jazz orchestras.

"Bob has been a guiding force in my life and my most ardent supporter," she says. "When I was young, I was driven. Now I am pursuing and enjoying my passion."

Garber's voice reflects her maturity, seasoned as it is by her life experience. She sings with passion, capturing the pains and joys of life on each song, both live and on CD.

Smile includes 14 tunes by some of the greatest songwriters, among them Alan Lerner, Ira and George Gershwin, Lorenz Hart and Richard Rogers, and Duke Ellington. She covers Cry Me a River, Stormy Weather, Bewitched, Bothered and Bewildered, On the Street Where You Live, Old Devil Moon and the upbeat I Got Rhythm.

Smile was produced and arranged by two-time National Jazz Awards winner for producer of the year, pianist Bill King. The CD includes King on piano, Pat La Barbera on saxophone, Reg Schwager on guitar, Duncan Hopkins on bass and Davide DiRenzo on drums.

Golf book will put a smile on your face

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It never ceases to amaze my non-golfing friends that an entire television station is devoted exclusively to the sport. They scrunch their faces in disbelief that anyone could watch an entire round of golf on TV, let alone show after show on the sport.

Their wonderment deepens when they learn there is no end to books about golf, magazines about golf, golf stores, golf courses, mini-golf, golf vacations, and on and on and on. All that for a sport whose object is to knock a little ball into a hole.

Many golfers, and the media that cater to them, do take the sport rather seriously – the rules and etiquette of golf would give a Talmudic scholar pause – so it's nice to see a light-hearted book aimed at the golfing shlepers among us.

I.J. Schecter understands the game of golf as a duffer might understand it. In Slices: Observations from the Wrong Side of the Fairway, (Wiley Canada), he has written a how-to book for anyone who wants to learn how to enjoy the sport and not take it too seriously.

Unlike instructional golf magazines that aim to help golfers shave a few strokes off their score to bring them into the 70s, Schecter offers advice for "people like me who have the quest to break 100 – the holy grail."

An award-winning author who writes for golf publications and corporate clients, he believe "it's important for people to laugh at themselves." Slices amply succeeds at that, and at times I found myself laughing out loud at Schecter's observations, gleaned from many years on the course.

At 34, he's been playing golf since he was a teenager, when he started with his father's "old partial lefty set." It was one of the sports he and his friends took up "to channel our hormones in a legally acceptable way."

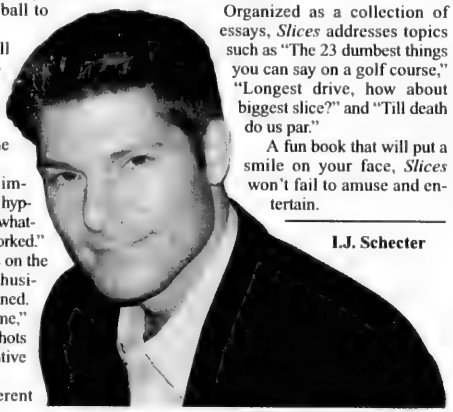
He's been flailing away for years, and he admits he still can't master the sport. An accomplished softball player – he was on two Canadian teams at the Maccabiah Games in Israel – he said he just can't fully make the adjustment from baseball to golf.

"When I see the ball sitting there… it turns into a fastball" and he takes a mighty swing that, all too often, ends up sending the ball on an adventure off the fairway and into the trees.

He's tried lessons (the improvement was "marginal"), hypnosis, aligning his chakras (whatever that is), but "nothing worked."

Despite his many scores on the wrong side of 100, his enthusiasm for the game hasn't waned. "I feel compelled by the game," he said. "If I have 100 bad shots but one good one, the incentive is to come back."

That's part of the "inherent optimism" in the sport – despite bad rounds, many golfers feel they'll do better the next time out, he said.



I.J. Schecter

Organized as a collection of essays, Slices addresses topics such as "The 23 dumbest things you can say on a golf course," "Longest drive, how about biggest slice?" and "Till death do us par."

A fun book that will put a smile on your face, Slices won't fail to amuse and entertain.

Tee up, bear down, focus, then… relax

Years ago, The CJN employed a fellow who, by his own admission, was a pretty good golfer. He was a low handicapper, and the way he told his story, on one memorable occasion, he was in range of attaining a lifelong dream: scoring par over 18 holes.

Everything was going right for him that day. He was playing a course of reasonable difficulty yet was hitting every shot solidly and his touch did not elude him on the greens.

By the last few holes, he realized a par 72 was within reach – if only he didn't screw up.

Teeing up at the 18th, he was even with the course and needed just one more par to finish with a 72.

Although it's been a few years since I've heard this story, I believe it was his second shot that did him in.

Facing a large body of water between him and the green, our usually capable fellow mis-hit the ball, flubbing it into the drink. It was one of his only poor shots of the day and angry with the result, his club quickly chased the ball into the water. Not content to punish the one club alone, he flung his entire bag with all his clubs into the soup.

Yes, he was plenty angry. So near, and yet so far.

Too bad he didn't know about the calming effects of yoga.

Golf is a strange sport in many ways. To be a truly fine golfer, you must find the proper combination of intensity and relaxation, mental toughness and calmness – not to mention flexibility, with ample doses of strength and skill.

No wonder it's so hard to score 4s and 5s on a consistent basis.

Manufacturers have come up with no end of golf gizmos and equipment to aid in attaining golfing nirvana, but in recent years, in keeping with the times and current trends, a different approach has emerged to help golfers succeed on the course.

Yoga for golf has become increasingly popular as golfers, among many others in all walks of life, catch on to the physical and mental benefits of the ancient discipline.

Lynn Weinfeld is a yoga practitioner, an instructor who touts "the mind/body approach to golf fitness."

Lynn Weinfeld

She offers workshops and classes for golfers to help them better their scores and, more importantly, to play the game without the doubts that can plague even good golfers.

As she explains it, yoga, if practised properly, "begins to affect all other parts of your life."

Like some other exercises, yoga tones the body, increases flexibility and range of movement, enhances balance and coordination – all improvements that should pay off on the course.

As part of her class in hatha yoga, exercises are practised that increase flexibility in the shoulders and hips while lengthening and strengthening muscles, particularly those in the stomach, she said.

Postures are chosen to provide the strength and flexibility needed by golfers, although all athletes can benefit, she said.

"Everything in yoga includes becoming aware. You have to be in the moment… With yoga you have an inner mirror."

In practical terms, that means a golfer is better able to focus on the elements that make a good shot while not being distracted by nagging doubts.

Part of every class includes a focus on breathing techniques to calm and relax the body," Weinfeld said. "Then you can focus.

"It's about being mindful, being in the moment, without thinking about anything else."

Weinfeld, a certified yoga instructor who also works in marketing research, acknowledges that for some guys, "yoga is still hocus pocus."

But it is receiving mainstream attention, she said. You can find yoga instruction on the Golf Channel and popular golf magazines carry articles on adapting yoga for golf.

Weinfeld believes that "the proper mental state enhances the ability to control and direct the motivating potential of the emotions. Dealing with such feelings as fear and anger on the golf course is a major challenge for even the best tournament players and a well-conceived yoga practice aids in learning to maintain a balanced emotional state."

Now if our old CJN colleague can just retrieve his clubs from the water, maybe he, too, can get on the road to a more balanced emotional state and his long sought-after par. —PL

Matisyahu more than a passing fad

ARTS IN FOCUS
By Oren Shefa

When Matthew Miller began rapping at open-mike competitions in Oregon as a teenager, far from his White Plains, N.Y., home, no one really paid him much mind. Being white and bearing the initials M and M apparently didn't have the same kind of effect the second time around.

But when Miller returned home, assembled a band, immersed himself in Jewish Orthodoxy and changed his name to Matisyahu, heads began to turn. And just when it seemed that this beat-boxing Chabadnic's 15 minutes were ticking down towards their final tock, Matisyahu went out and earned himself some respect.

In 2004, following the release of his debut album Shake off the Dust... Arise, Matisyahu's appearance on Jimmy Kimmel Live served as the musician's coming-out party. A two-minute set that began with a tantalizing display of beat-boxing prowess was all that the world got to see, but it turned out to be more than enough. A video clip of that performance quickly made its way through online chat rooms, message boards and personal e-mails.

Here was this young man in conservative black garb, with brimmed hat, glasses and full beard, spitting, clicking, heaving and singing into a microphone. It was, at the time, impossible to know what to make of this chassidic dancehall-style reggae artist.

Surely this had to be some kind of joke, and yet, contrary to expectations, the punch line never came. Matisyahu wasn't some kid looking for an angle by playing dress-up. This wasn't the same as 2 Live Jews (whose music was a riff on that of another rapper) all over again. (Thank God!)

Even so, watching Matisyahu perform, one could not help but wonder how long the spectacle would last. Yes, he had talent, but could he maintain a following once the novelty of a religious Jew "dropping bombs" on stage began to wear off?

Two years and three albums later, it seems the answer is a resounding Yes! The 2005 live recording Live at Stubb's proved to be the catalyst. The album highlighted an intensity in Matisyahu brought out by the deep connection he has with his audiences. His sophomore release Youth received good but cautious reviews from critics, mostly related to the album's more polished and therefore less edgy offerings thanks to the contributions of producer Bill Laswell. That said, Youth still managed to burst out of the gate and peak at No. 4 on the Billboard charts. Both Stubb's and Youth have since reached gold status, selling over 500,000 copies each.

Last year, Matisyahu's aggressive touring schedule covered North America, Europe and Israel. He shared the stage with such prominent names as Sting, Trey Anastasio (former Phish frontman) and Dave Matthews Band. He'll be visiting Toronto with DMB June 13 at Molson Amphitheatre.

Despite his success, Miller has had to endure some rough patches along the way. In March he parted ways with JDub his management company over questionable handling of his finances, and he is currently embroiled in legal battles over a broken contract. Trying to balance his Orthodox lifestyle with his emerging celebrity status has also proven to be difficult at times when his travelling schedule conflicts with keeping Shabbat or when he has to reject the occasional female fan jumping onstage in the hope of stealing an embrace.

It's been a whirlwind couple of years for Matisyahu, one in which his faith, endurance and resolve have all been tested. Through it all, his passion for music and his determination to deliver his message have kept him focused and grounded. He's proven that he is no flash in the pan, and though he's still finding his rhythm, he can feel confident that his fans will give him all the time he needs to work out the kinks.

Baby Noah: a 10-pound gift

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

A few weeks ago, I wrote that Miriam and I had received a heavenly gift of a seven-pound 12-ounce little boy. His name is Noah River, and he was born with a full head of hair and an immediate curiosity for life.

Our little guy is now six weeks and a day old. I would count the hours but am not exactly sure when The CJN goes to press.

With Noah in our world, our lives have changed more than I could possibly describe. Things feel differently, nothing seems to smell the same and the world has just generally taken on a new look.

Whereas my days used to be filled with my responsibilities at Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee, writing, family, friends and other sundry ventures – most of my waking (and sleeping) energy is now geared toward Noah. I make sure he has burped after his last feeding, and hope he is limiting his projectile vomiting, a nasty habit he has, requiring never-ending laundry runs.

Upon arrival home, after seeing the intense day Miriam has spent with our 10-pound bundle of pleasure and watchfulness, I do my best to change the next few diapers, walk him in the stroller and bathe him before he goes to sleep, or so we hope.

I learned to swaddle baby Noah at Mount Sinai Hospital. Generally, however, within a few minutes after I lay him in his bassinet, the blankets are loose and the little one is usually able to kick them off. Miriam, however, is an excellent swaddler. Adeptly, she folds one side over, wraps it under Noah, flips up the bottom portion of the blanket leaving enough room for the baby to move his feet around, and then folds the opposite side over, ultimately wrapping it around Noah's back. He then appears to look like a little human snow cone.

Changing diapers is not as daunting a duty as I had heard. I took a survey of a number of my pals prior to delivery, asking them if they had changed diapers. Basically, my results showed: most men over 50 rarely, if ever, change diapers; from 30 to 50, they do so when their wives are at wit's end; under 30 – well, the role of men is clearly changing and it seems that in this age range, husbands dive right into this sometimes grimy task.

But you know, strangely, just as I love bathing Noah, I also quite like changing his diapers. I do because this is when I feel most attached to his physical needs.

I know breastfeeding can be very demanding for any mother, but I am envious of Miriam, knowing she is sustaining our little boy through her milk. She is giving him life directly from her life. Of course, changing diapers doesn't come close to that level of intimacy, but it is my chance to help take care of Noah, to sustain him, in a way that he needs me. There is something very beautiful about being needed by a baby.

I'm 46 years old and a new father. I see the sense in having children earlier on – it's far easier on the back – but in truth this is exactly the right time for Noah to come into our lives, to come into the world.

I watch him and then watch him again – intrigued by his amusing bubbling noises, fascinated by the strength in those little legs and overwhelmed by the angelic look on his tiny face as he sleeps in his mother's arms, contently snuggling into her shoulder.

I am a father, a bit freaked out, but blessed and infatuated with our 10-pound gift.

Advice from the wedding-planning trenches

By RIVA TURNER
Special to The CJN

The question has been "popped" and a beautiful new diamond is sitting proudly on your ring finger. Now your cellphone won't stop ringing. Mazel tov! You're engaged. Welcome to the next stage of your life.

I remember that moment in terms of emotions. They were: surprise, followed by a split second of disbelief, happiness and then came the tears. I'm pretty sure I said yes.

The first thing we did was relax and take some time to let the engagement sink in. We didn't delve into wedding planning right away, because we wanted to enjoy every minute of the moment. Once all the excitement died down to a dull roar, we had to start the long and arduous task of planning a wedding. I'm not being dramatic. Just ask anyone who has had to plan a simchah. It's a challenge, but it's not impossible if you plan.

Weddings are time-consuming, there are a million details, you often have to deal with 18 different people at once, you have to try and stay sane, and to some degree you have to please your fiancé, yourself and two families (if you're lucky – sometimes there are three, or more).

Luckily for me, there were only two sides to please. I also had one year to plan, but adding up all the time I spent on the wedding, it could have all been done in six months. A one-year time frame is standard for most weddings, due largely to the fact that most halls or event venues are booked 12 months in advance.

As a publicist, I've done my share of planning, but I have to tell you that my own wedding was my toughest event yet. Here are some helpful hints I picked up along the way.

It's always best to have a budget

What Do I Do? Naturally you want to have your dream wedding, but don't bite off more than you can chew. I conducted an informal survey of average people – my girlfriends and myself – and found that the average person spends between one to 15 hours looking for the "perfect" gown. This estimated total time did not include the proverbial "looking through magazines." Just imagine the amount of time it will take to get everything in place. Start by writing down everything you think you will need to do for the wedding, then talk to friends and family, and think about hiring a wedding planner.

Timelines and Deadlines: Once I had thought about the wedding, I created a checklist of all the things I needed to do and how soon they needed to be completed. The list helped to keep me on track. You will find that most wedding websites have downloadable checklists and timelines. Try to finalize as many items right away to avoid last-minute scrambling and stress.

Budget, Budget, Budget: Even if you are covered in terms of finances, it's still best to create a budget. My husband and I figured out how much we were willing to spend on certain items and adjusted our budget accordingly. Again, check wedding websites for downloadable templates. Follow your budget, because odds and ends tend to add up quickly, and before you know it, your dream wedding could become a money pit.

Magazine Heaven: Back to the surveyed girlfriends, the average person buys between five and 40 bridal magazines during their engagement. And approximately 99.9 per cent of newly engaged women go out the next day and come home with one of these magazines. They are full of wedding trends, wedding gowns and great ideas and advice on planning. My future sister-in-law and I would often sit with a pile of magazines and rip out pages we liked.

Wheeling and Dealing: When it comes to caterers, photographers, videographers, florists, etc., negotiation is the word of the day. Think of your wedding as a really expensive pair of shoes. Why pay full price when you can get them at a discount? However, there is a fine line between less expensive and downright cheap. Try taking a friend along for a second opinion.

Most importantly, don't stress out: no matter what happens, have fun. A wise friend said to my husband and me upon hearing the news of our engagement: "More marriage, less wedding!" In other words, a wedding is a wonderful thing, but it has absolutely no bearing on your marriage. Concentrate on being a good partner. Remember: it's a simchah, so celebrate! All it takes is a little planning.

Videos preserve the memory of a special event

By JEN THOMPSON
Special to The CJN

The best way to preserve the memory of your special event is to hire a professional videographer. Lisa Productions (905-764-1033) and Rafael Studios (416-667-9999) are two videographers who will ensure you have a beautiful keepsake of your event.

Lisa Feinstein has been videotaping events for more than 25 years. When you speak with her, it quickly becomes clear that this is not just a job for her but a labour of love. She creates valuable family heirlooms that will be cherished for generations to come by her clients.

One of the reasons that Feinstein, who is a mother of five teenagers, is so successful as a videographer is that she understands the needs of children and adults.

She has a solid reputation in the community, with many of her clients coming to her through word of mouth. She is now being asked to video bar mitzvahs by parents whose own bar mitzvahs she videotaped 20 years earlier.

Feinstein says it is important for her to be surrounded with good people when she works. "You are only as good as the people you work with," she says.

Her son, Matt, has joined the family business. "Sixteen-year-old Matt has become such a fabulous asset to the party industry," says Feinstein. He works as an assistant, and clients have come to not only appreciate his skills but also request that he work their event, she adds.

Feinstein produces videos that are fun to watch and a true remembrance of your event.

Matt and Lisa Feinstein

For Feinstein, videotaping your simchah is an honour. She has a personal attachment to all her clients, and it is this warmth that is conveyed in your video. She uses professional camera and lighting equipment and can produce a finished video within a week following an event.

Rafael Studios has been providing professional videography and photography services for 17 years. Andy Koltai founded Rafael Studios in 1989 and his two sons, Tamas and Gabor, joined the business in 2001.

The creators of beautiful video memories for their clients, the Koltais are well respected in the industry. They produce clean-looking videos that tell the story of an event through the footage.

Rafael Studios do all their editing in-house and use professional broadcast quality equipment to videotape an event. Lighting is low key and all filming is done unobtrusively so as to not interfere with your event. Clients get to preview their videos before completion, which allows for any changes to be made in the editing process. The final edited version is ready approximately eight weeks after an event.

Remembering the less fortunate at your simchah

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Simchahs are a time to revel in joy and happiness, but in the heat of these happy moments, it's also important to realize one's good fortune in being able to celebrate.

In that spirit of blending revelry with reflection, Mazon Canada (416-783-7554; www.mazoncanada.ca) offers a special program for party hosts, in which they donate a portion of the money they spend on food for their function to charitable causes that benefit those battling hunger.

"We want people to remember that at the time of your simchah, there are those who are not so fortunate and it's nice to help them out," says Shira Lester-Cohen, Mazon Canada's executive director.

"So we ask people to donate three per cent of their food costs to Mazon and we allocate funds, non-denominationally, to organizations fighting hunger on the front lines across Canada."

In recognition of donors' generosity, Mazon provides place-card services.

"The personalized cards are done professionally by a printer, with the name of the guest and a line for what table they're sitting at. And on the inside, there's a little bit of information about Mazon and a message noting the guest's presence is being honoured with a donation," says Lester-Cohen.

While the place cards are a courtesy, she points out they are also practical and appreciated by donors.

"Place cards are something everybody is going to need for a wedding," she says.

"And with those place cards, you may be giving breakfast to a group of kids for a week."

The beneficiaries of Mazon's charitable efforts are diverse, ranging from breakfast programs for inner-city kids in Toronto schools to biweekly meal services for native youths in northern British Columbia.

In addition to wedding place cards, Mazon also caters to parents holding birthday parties for their children.

The party host donates a certain sum of money for each kid who attends the party and these kids get a special certificate when they leave the party.

"If parents want to attach candy to the certificate, they can," says Lester-Cohen.

"Instead of just giving out a loot bag, with this certificate, you've helped another little kid have a snack. And it's a nice educational tool of what it means to help somebody else."

She adds that the kids are particularly happy when the certificate is personalized with their name on it.

Starting up in 1986, the organization is active in both Canada and the United States. Canadian offices are in Toronto and Montreal.

Mazon is now actively trying to get more rabbis involved in the charity by having them spread the word about Mazon to kids going through the bar/bat mitzvah program, as well couples who are taking marriage classes, so that they may eventually choose to make donations for their special events.

Let the joy of your simcha last long after the guests go home.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My in-laws have been making a huge production for their daughter's upcoming wedding. There have been numerous showers and an engagement party that was as elaborate as any wedding. I actually bought a beautiful new outfit to wear to the engagement party, and it was more than I could afford at the time.

The wedding is just around the corner, and our finances are tight at the moment. I would love to buy a new dress for the wedding, but that would make our financial situation more difficult. My husband says I should wear the dress I wore to the engagement party, because he is wearing the same suit, but I feel weird doing that. All of the same people will be at the wedding.

Do you think it's OK to wear the same outfit to two affairs if the same people will be there?

Tight for a Dress

Dear Tight for a Dress

What matters is what you think, or, more importantly, how you feel. You have to be comfortable at the wedding. Are you going to be self-conscious? Are you going to have fun, or will you be thinking all night about what others may be saying about your dress?

Men are lucky when it comes to formal parties. I don't think I could tell if a guy is wearing a suit he wore before. They all look alike, and a new shirt and a tie are all it takes to freshen the look.

It's only natural to want to look your best. But you can change your look without blowing the budget. Accessorize! Add a shawl, a brooch or a belt. Do something different with your hair and makeup. There are many ways to change your look and take the focus off the dress and put it onto you as a whole.

I can't imagine people standing around whispering, "Can you believe she wore the same dress?" Once you say your hellos and see that everyone is in good spirits and having fun, you'll stop thinking about what you're wearing and just enjoy yourself. Only you can decide if you can get through this comfortably. I think you can keep your financial priorities intact and still have a good time.

Still photography at its finest

By JENNA ROSMAN
Special to The CJN

Distinguished photographer Al Gilbert of Gilbert and Associates, is donating 4,000 photographs of Jewish figures to the Jewish Historical Society.

"These are files that the Jewish Historical Society wants to make sure are preserved for all time," said Gilbert, who has been a photographer since 1945 and was named a member of the Order of Canada in 1990. They have agreed to take the 4,000 files now, he added, but they don't have the finances or the place to keep the additional 16,000 files Gilbert has available.

Files include the photographs and negatives of presidents of Toronto synagogues and community leaders, along with their biographies.

"The Gilbert family, starting with my father, has recorded a generation of Jewry. We've started to go through the files, to pick up names that were instrumental in the Jewish community over the years," said veteran photographer Al Gilbert, who has photographed all of the Israeli Prime Ministers.

He has lectured about photography all over the world, including in the United States, Mexico, Hawaii, New Zealand, Australia, Great Britain, Ireland, Belgium, Austria, Norway, China, Russia and the Philippines.

He said the advent of digital photography has influenced and changed the direction of photography.

"Everyone [today] is shooting as fast as they can shoot – that's what they are getting. No one is looking at the people," he said.

"There were techniques that I learned through trial and error, because there were no schools teaching what they call classical portraiture. I developed my own style."

Gilbert said he was able to achieve a three-dimensional look by creating "a foreground that was out of focus, crystal clear subject matter and an out-of-focus, turbulent background. What I'm trying to say is that when digital hit, all those techniques that took me years to develop, you could now do with software."

More than 160 of Gilbert's images of the Jewish community are already on permanent display at Baycrest.

"You've got weddings, you've got athletes of the Jewish community and Jewish war heroes. There are also pictures of famous photographers who were doing the sports themes at the time," he said. "Every single one of these images [on display] is part of the history of this community."

He said it's fundamental for the photo subject to be "married" to his or her environment, in order to secure a mood.

Before doing a project, Gilbert chats with the subjects in his office, analyzing their body language and getting a sense of who they are.

"I'll watch, maybe, your hands, what you do with your hands. That's what I look for," he said.

PARTY PLANNER

Find unique, inexpensive gifts and giveaways

By JEN THOMPSON
Special to The CJN

The perfect way to end a simchah is to send your guests home with something to remember your event. But finding affordable, creative, unique party favours can often be a time consuming and expensive experience.

Cheryl Render and Dana Collin have found a solution to this problem by creating Great Gifts and Giveaways. www.greatgg.com. Phone: Cheryl Render (416-452-8022) Dana Collin (416-716-2905).

Opened in September 2005, Great Gifts and Giveaways is a home-based business located in Thornhill, Ont. The giveaway business has become an important aspect of many events, and prizes are often expensive and extravagant. Being mothers themselves, Render and Collin saw a need for fun, practical and affordable gifts and giveaways. Their business allows customers to provide special mementos for their party guests without breaking the bank. Because they are home based, they are able to pass on the savings to their clients.

Party planners can find something for everyone at Great Gifts and Giveaways. Shop by appointment for no-pressure, personal attention, or just come to browse. Young children, teenagers and adults, male and female, can enjoy practical and unusual gifts and gadgets. Popular items include tranquillity fountains, mini-digital cameras, MP3 players and poker sets.

One of the things that make Render and Collin's company different is that they offer value items that make great giveaways without charging expensive prices. Great Gift and Giveaway items range in price from as little as $1 to approximately $30.

The two women understand the needs of their clientele. Often, people spend a fortune simply to have one grand prize at an event. However, by shopping at Great Gifts and Giveaways you can purchase an array of prizes that everyone will love. A Caller ID phone for $12 is just one example of an item that gives consumers more value for their money. Instead of only one child leaving your party with a gift, many children can leave with a practical and fun keepsake of the event.

In addition to gifts for bar and bat mitzvahs, Render and Collin also have giveaways for corporate events and fundraisers, as well as gifts for hostesses and teachers. Their showroom offers such products as beautiful, 46-piece candle sets for only $7. These are unbelievable prices that you just cannot find in a store.

Loot bags are also popular at Great Gifts and Giveaways. Girls and boys of all ages will be happy with their gifts. Lip gloss, sporting key chains, feather socks, flying monkeys and bubble bath all sell for $3 dollars or less.

With new items arriving monthly, Great Gifts and Giveaways keeps up with the latest and greatest gadgets and toys for all age levels of children.

"It is the kids that dictate the items for sale in our showroom," Dana says.

The Great Gifts and Giveaways showroom is a non-intimidating, clean, well laid out environment where shoppers can browse or shop freely without being pressured or having to deal with lineups or crowds.

Render says one of the best things about their store is the "wow" factor. Children of all ages love the environment and truly enjoy exploring the unique product lines.

Great Gifts and Giveaways offers you fun, practical, affordable gifts. So, when planning your next simchah, you may want to check out this destination for incredible value and new ideas.

Try a country club setting for your big day

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

While there are many facets in making your party an unforgettable event, the venue is definitely one of the top considerations.

If the place is grooving, chances are your guests will too.

And these days, a popular destination is the storied country club.

"Bringing your guests to a club creates a private [ambience]," says Lino Ferreira, food and beverage director at the Richmond Hill Country Club (RHCC). "Unlike at other venues, they have the entire floor to themselves."

In addition to the privacy element, a country club also offers benefits in terms of décor and scenery.

"The ballroom leads out to a beautiful balcony overlooking the swimming pool and tennis courts," Ferreira says of the RHCC. "The grounds are great for taking pictures."

When selecting a venue, ensure that the party room's dance floor accommodates the number of guests you have and that the acoustics are suitable for the music.

On the customer service side of things, Ferreira, a former 30-year plus employee of the Four Seasons chain, advises that the person directing the venue must be dedicated, not only in the planning process, but during the actual event.

"I never leave until the final course is served," Ferreira says. "We make that commitment here and it's always delivered."

Ferreira adds that it is crucial for the country club to work in tandem with vendors, giving them enough time to set up and organize music equipment, flowers, video materials and whatever else is needed to put the show on the road.

"We always make ourselves available and clients can bring in whoever they want," Ferreira says. "We'll block the whole room at a certain time so that the vendors can set up and there won't be a rush."

As for trends, Ferreira says the traditional sweet table at the end of the night is not as common today, with a growing number of hosts opting to either combine desserts with the meal or serve at special, sinful food stations.

"Chocolate fountain and crepe stations are common," Ferreira says. "And some people are serving cold cuts at the end of the night, which is [sometimes] a preference, especially following an afternoon of drinking."

The RHCC has standards in place designating how many servers should wait on tables, based on the number of people seated there.

The club also provides food sampling for party hosts so that they know what the cuisine is like from first-hand experience.

In addition to its opulent ballroom, which seats about 250 people with a dance floor and up to 350 people without dancing, the RHCC boasts other party rooms. One seats about 200 people and is frequently used for receptions. Another smaller room seats about 80 people and is available on Saturdays and Sundays.

To learn more about the Richmond Hill Country Club, log onto their website at www.richmondhillcountryclub.com or dial 905-731-2800.

Designer clothing at a fraction of the price

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

While shopping is one of the simple pleasures in life, finding the perfect outfit can be nearly impossible and may cost a pretty penny.

This season, choosing a dress could be easier than you think. At Déjà Vu (905-472-9566), a boutique specializing in women's resale clothing, you'll find a large selection of affordable classic dresses. The store, located at 5990 16th Ave. at Markham Road, has been selling the best in resale to loyal customers for 13 years.

Offering an extensive collection of women's clothing, Déjà Vu sells everything from evening wear to denim and accessories. Sorting through the many items brought to her by clients, Theresa Lobraico, the store's owner, chooses only the best quality garments for resale.

Lobraico, who was an avid consignment shopper herself, opened the business based on her instinctive knowledge of fashion and style. "I just know it when I see it – I'm very selective with what I take in. It has to look like new," she says. Déjà Vu clothing must be current within two years and in excellent condition.

Once dry-cleaned, the like-new pieces are ready for sale. "People don't even know that the garments are resale items," she says. Lobraico splits the profits 50/50 with the original owner of a garment after it is sold.

Dreaming about Versace gowns? They can be all yours at a fraction of the price! The store boasts a collection of upscale brands such as Sigrid Olsen and Hugo Boss. "We'd carry a Boss suit for approximately $300, when it'd regularly be retailed at $1,000 or higher," Labraico says.

Since all garments are current within two years, any look you want can be achieved. "Style is timeless," Lobraico says.

Lobraico also offers wardrobe consultations for her clients. She will come to your home and sort through your wardrobe to develop cohesive looks. Coordinating the items in your wardrobe with new purchases will smarten and freshen up your look.

While perusing the selection of gorgeous and timeless fashions at Déjà Vu, you'll be amazed at the quality offered. And it doesn't stop there. Since the items have been resold, they are guaranteed to be unique. And don't forget to bring in your clothing as well; what you don't want may be another woman's treasure.

Be sure to book an appointment with Lobraico for best service. You'll be amazed at what the fashionable eye sees.

Live music in demand at today's parties

By JENNA ROSMAN
CJN Intern

Quality entertainment is fundamental when planning a special event such as a bar or bat mitzvah party.

Times Square Entertainment (905- 881-6400, rick@torontopartyguide.com, www.torontopartyguide.com/timessquare) is one company that's able to deliver the goods.

"Times Square Entertainment is a top-quality, first-class entertainment company that provides DJ services, dances, interactive MCs and live bands," said owner Rick Levine, who has been involved in the entertainment industry for more than 10 years.

Levine is also the lead singer of The Good Vibrations Band of Times Square Entertainment, which specializes in music of the 1960s.

"Times Square is much more than a DJ company. It started out in 1994 as a company that was producing an American-style, interactive DJ style for bar mitzvahs in Canada, which meant lots of style, lots of personality, the latest in music and lighting," says Levine. "We were the first company in Canada to use a DJ booth, which was very impressive in the overall look."

Times Square Entertainment offers professional event planning services. "People planning a function need not worry about anything. They just leave it up to us," he said. "They just give us their input and we give them feedback with what needs to be done, and how to accomplish what they want to accomplish."

Levine says that Times Square Entertainment consists of professional DJs and MCs who know how to keep both children as well as adults interested.

He said that while most MCs today focus solely on the younger audience, disregarding the needs of the adults, Times Square Entertainment satisfies all partygoers.

"We keep everyone all interested by setting a rhythm where at times during an event we'll gear our music and entertainment towards kids with interactive games and contests, and other times we'll switch modes and entertain the adults with entertainment such as professional vocalists who sing live to backtracks of some of their [the partygoers' favourite songs from their era," he said. Levine says that current entertainment trends include a diversity of entertainment with a greater demand for live acts.

"It's refreshing to see live music and live musicians and talented artists as a break to what they've been seeing time and time again at bar or bat mitvahs," he said.

Flowers add 'wow' factor to party

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Flowers can add a 'wow' factor to any party venue, says Renee Birnbaum of An Affair to Remember (905-881-6686).

The owner of a complete decor company, Birnbaum says she has been concentrating on flowers because "that's the way it's going. [Hosts] are getting tired of themes. They're taking a different road."

While flowers have always been front and centre at weddings, Birnbaum says, they are now being used more and more at bar and bat mitzvahs as well.

"Flowers can set the tone and the mood of the party. If you're looking for a romantic tone, add some candlelight, and use roses, peonies or orchids in pastel colours.

"If you want upbeat and bright, use flowers in primary colours. They'll brighten up the room."

Flowers don't have to break your budget, she stresses.

"I've used vases with petals and floating candles, and then added a backdrop to the head table. We can also add some greenery around the room. It's not expensive, but it sets the mood of the party."

A recent wedding at Adath Israel Congregation was so impressive "that the calls have not stopped," she says.

"Our colour theme was black and white, and for the centrepieces, we used black table liners on which we placed white hydrangeas, calla lilies, or roses inside clear vases. In the vases we inserted black stones and crystals.

"The white on white backdrop behind the head table was floor-to-ceiling, and on black pillars, we placed more white flowers inside black glass vases."

The effect was "stunning. It was elegant, and yet not extravagant. Guests felt like they were walking into a four-star hotel. I always tell my clients that only our look is expensive."

She can work on a short deadline, she says, but suggests calling about six months in advance so she can plan ahead.

"I have all kinds of ways to set the tone of your party."

Gladstone's offers service, ambience and kashrut in midtown

By JESSICA FREIMAN
CJN Intern

Finding a venue for a simchah is enough of a challenge these days, but a new glatt kosher wine bar and grill has made the choice much easier with its great location, delicious fare and sophisticated atmosphere.

Gladstone's (www.gladstones.ca) midtown location is one of its greatest draws for those looking to throw a simchah to remember. Situated on Eglinton Avenue one block west of Avenue Road, Gladstone's has been the scene of many weddings, engagements and bar mitzvah parties since it first opened its doors in January 2005.

"We have a very versatile space, with a mezzanine level as well as a private upstairs dining room," says general manager Gino Falcitelli. "Our most popular occasions are weddings, and we have held on-site wedding ceremonies in the space."

The venue has two spacious floors and has hosted occasions with guest lists ranging from 20 to 300 people. "We've also held corporate events at Gladstone's. Our private dining room has the option of hooking up a laptop to our plasma screen for business presentations for up to 35 people."

However, the main reason for Gladstone's popularity with those throwing simchahs in Toronto is its menu.

"We offer a whole array of menu items, ranging from prime rib to duck to pasta to sushi," says Falcitelli.

A new sushi chef has recently joined Gladstone's and has expanded the options for appetizers at functions.

"Clients now have the option to have the cocktail hour with the sushi chef," Falcitelli says.

Hosts have the option of having up to 200 guests for a sit-down occasion or more than 300 for cocktails, but Falcitelli says Gladstone's service and ambience are never compromised.

Gladstone's is located at 398 Eglinton Avenue W. To book, call 416-487-9500.

Find all you need to plan your next simchah

By JEN THOMPSON
Special to The CJN

Planning a party is often time-consuming, stressful and difficult, but it doesn't need to be. One-stop party shops allow consumers to find everything they need under one roof.

A party should be an enjoyable experience and that includes planning it. Kosher 'N Natural (416-789-7173) and Loots (416-787-5668) are two places that can serve a variety of party needs.

Known as the "Candy Man," Jack Schnoll established Kosher 'N Natural 24 years ago at 3413 Bathurst St. Kosher 'N Natural is an all-kosher candy store with the largest selection of kosher candy in Toronto. Its popularity has continued to grow over the years, as Schnoll and his staff provide friendly, welcoming service in a truly "sweet" environment.

In addition to its selection, Kosher 'N Natural provides many other delectable services. Candy floss, popcorn and pretzel machines are all available to rent for weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs, and any other event where fun is a priority. Chocolate fountains and sweet tables are also very popular items available to rent.

Kosher N' Natural can provide balloons, loot bags filled with toys and candy of all flavours, and unique gift baskets for your event.

Schnoll will also create all-kosher gift baskets that can be filled with such items as fresh fruit, baked goods, bottled water and nuts that make perfect gifts for hostesses or out-of-town guests who will be attending your simchah.

Loots also offers party facilities called Club Loots – for fun birthday or bar and bat mitzvah parties.

Established in 1992 by Terri and David Leese, Loots has grown over the years to include a complete range of services including the widest and coolest selection of loot bags in the city. It's a one-stop shop in person or by phone and they deliver everywhere. One visit to the Loots website (www.loots.com) tells you that Loots is all about fun for kids.

Club Loots offers an amazing party environment for kids. "Club Loots throws a party like none other that your kids will never forget," say Loots creators Terri and David Leese. "For boys, it's video arcade and interactive tournament play, and for girls, it's dance games, glamour and karaoke."

Loots also offers one of the most unique party experiences available: its two party buses, designed for fun, will bring the party directly to you. Parents can choose either a video game bus or a disco party bus for kids.

Loots can also supply the perfect cake for any event, and it can be customized for your occasion.

The philosophy of Loots is incredibly friendly and welcoming for both children and adults. Say Terri and David: "Our Club Loots party facility and our party buses are packed with things for kids to do. We have a complete video games area, sound system, special lighting effects, props, loot bags and much more. So whether you visit us at Club Loots, or we come to you with one of our party buses, your kids will have fun, and you can have piece of mind knowing professionals are running the show."

Most culinary cognoscenti agree that, more than any single factor (style of preparation, primary ingredients, or seasoning), freshness is the key to exquisite taste.

Nowhere is this more axiomatic than at the Granite Club, where the preoccupation with freshness borders on the obsessive. If there's one rule etched in Granite, says Executive Chef Nigel Didcock, it's the "dew date"; i.e. if the morning dew's not on the produce, then it's past due.

Field-to-table freshness is de rigueur

This is hyperbole, of course, but anyone who's spent time on a farm knows whereof he speaks: the inimitable taste of field-to-table freshness that no amount of seasoning can mimic. "Mother Nature is the real head chef here," he winks. "We're just sous-chefs". Belying his modesty is an impeccable pedigree that includes a three-year tenure at the Connaught Hotel in London, England, as well as lengthy stints at the world-famous Troisgros Bothers Restaurant in France and, locally, the Sutton Place Hotel.

At the Granite Club, no expense is spared to ensure that Nature's bounty arrives via the express lane. Fresh produce is whisked to the Granite's kitchen several times daily, fresh fish flown in from Europe three times a week.

In keeping with this philosophy, says Didcock, "Menu choices should always be guided by what's in season. It's our job — our passion — to work with the finest fresh ingredients and bring out their full flavour."

Having satisfied this first principle, however, Didcock's culinary creations know no geographic or stylistic boundaries. Innovation? Many of the culinary trends showcased in Toronto's most avant-garde dining establishments originate in the Granite Club's kitchen. Didcock and his culinary team of some 150 people are united in pursuit of a singular goal: to ensure that each and every serving resonates with your palate. In his line of work, he says, "you're only as good as your last plate."

On that note, every single dish created at the Granite Club is photographed for the record. (How's that for job pressure?)

Most customers make menu requests or suggestions ranging from the vague to the highly specific. Didcock welcomes their input, often taking it in a captivating new direction. "If we can't do a concept justice, we won't," he says. "But we never impose our own ideas here, nor do we act like we have nothing to learn. When we're doing a function for a customer, they are part of our team, and we'll do everything short of giving them an apron to make them feel at home".

A line wisely drawn. We daresay that our Bubie would have donned that apron — with or without an invitation.

Didcock and his team are not only talented, they're closely-knit; he and his Sous-Chef, Ian Rodger, have worked together for 12 years. And how many event venues boast a full-time Pastry Chef? The Granite Club does. Here, Having Your Cake And Eating It Too takes on a whole new meaning. For Renato Del Sol, no cake is too elaborate, no pastry too fanciful; wedding cakes are the tip of the iceberg. Your dessert enjoys the same lofty status as your appetizers and entrées, giving your meal the fitting finale it deserves.

Traditionally private, for special events the Granite Club welcomes the community and members alike. From its exquisitely landscaped grounds (certified as conservation land by the American Audubon Society) to its lavishly-appointed dining rooms, the Granite Club is truly spectacular both inside and out. However elevated the resulting culinary expectations, the Granite Club invariably exceeds them.

Ever dreamed of having your own personal European chefs? At the Granite Club, for a few glorious hours, you do.

A perfect gown for a perfect wedding

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

Your wedding is the most special day of your life. For such a special day, everything should be perfect, including your dress.

To ensure that your dress is perfection, head to one of these retailers. They truly understand the importance of your special day.

Ritché (416-789-4378) has been offering the best in wedding gowns for the past 54 years. A family-run business, Ritché offers personalized and friendly service.

Carrying brands such as Alfred Sung, Maggie and Marissa Bridal, the boutique specializes but is not exclusive to bridal wear. As well as bridal gowns, the store offers everything for the bridal party, including dresses for bridesmaids, mother of the bride and even dresses for bat mitzvahs. Ritché also has a wide array of stunning evening wear, dresses that can be translated to other special occasions as well.

Gowns range from $800 to $3,000, and custom work is offered. With more than 750 gown samples to choose from, the store boasts one of the biggest selections in the city. Once dresses are ordered, alterations can all be done on the premises.

Offering a specialized service for brides, Ritché has five private rooms for gown viewing. While in these showrooms, you can sit back and relax. An expert consultant will help you peruse through the looks that you want to see and to try on gowns. Once a gown is chosen, it will take approximately four to five months for delivery, so allow for this period by planning ahead.

With such a long history in the bridal business, the confidence that comes with purchasing from Ritché is incomparable. "We've been around so long that people know that we will be here whenever they need us," says Vivian Prussky, the store's owner. "When the customer purchases a dress from us, they are really buying a year's worth of service, from choosing the design to altering."

When asked about trends, Prussky cites both minimalist and princess looks, which are the most popular among brides at the moment. "The one extreme is the extremely fitted strapless gown with a mermaid bottom. The other is a full A-line ball gown with plenty of embellishment and crystals," she says.

Whichever way you decide to go, you can rest assured that Ritché will give you any look you want to achieve. With so many samples to choose from as well as the personalized and warm service, the joy of your wedding will heighten by the minute.

Another option for bridal wear is Agnes Bridal Boutique (416-223-9993). For three years, the boutique has been carrying the European brand exclusively in Canada. For 18 years, the Polish brand has been making its name as a leading force in bridal wear in Europe.

Agnes gowns are completely customized. During an appointment, you peruse the various looks in the catalogue with the guidance of an expert consultant and you can see fabric samples. The cut, fit and design is also completely up to you. "We are always looking for ways to make the gowns more beautiful," says Eva Mulik of Agnes Bridal.

Whether it's crystal, ribbon or lace, Agnes Bridal can produce absolutely anything you dream up. Each step is approved by the bride to ensure a beautiful result. With every step factored in, the creation of the dress takes approximately six months.

Catering to the Orthodox community as well, many of Agnes Bridal's gowns are designed in modest styles, with optional pieces or trimmings. "We cater to both the modern and traditional bride," says Mulik. "It is not a problem to make a gown more modest."

Impeccably created, Agnes dresses are made of European fabric. And because of the customized nature of the dresses, you can be sure that your dress will never be duplicated. The simple elegance of these gowns and the European craftsmanship is something to marvel.

Finding the perfect dress can be quite daunting. But just like falling in love, you'll just know when it's a perfect fit. Just like your mate, the right dress will never cease to make you happy.

Travel in Israel where there's something for everyone

By JESSICA FREIMAN
CJN Intern

Have you ever wanted to take a vacation where you can snowboard in the morning and swim in the ocean that afternoon? Or perhaps scale mountain cliffs and visit the lowest point on earth on the same day? To find the ultimate travel destination, look no further than the Holy Land.

"In Israel, there are endless opportunities for travel," says Avie Esakov, manager of Heritage Tours at Go Israel Travel (www.goisraeltravel.com). "One can virtually do anything there.

"For example, Israel is world-renowned for hang gliding, and there is unparalleled bird watching in March and October. We like to say that the birds speak Hebrew, Russian and Amharic because they visit Israel, Russia and Ethiopia," he says. "Israel also has the opportunity for scuba diving in the Red Sea, and you can see some of finest coral in the world."

Go Israel Travel offers many types of tours. "We have one tour that focuses on world-famous sites. Masada, the Jewish fortress in the desert, is a UNESCO heritage site. The newly renovated Yad Vashem, Israel's national Holocaust museum, is difficult to describe because it's so incredible.

"We can also visit really substantial archeological sites that are being excavated as we speak, like Meggido, which is the inspiration of James Michener's book The Source. Also, the city of Caesarea has wonderful Roman ruins and was the largest port city in King Herod's time," Esakov says.

"There are the excavated cities of Hazor in Galilee, and Dan, the city of Lachish for the more adventuresome. These sites have a significant biblical connection."

If you go to the Negev desert with a Bible in hand, you can see how the desert has blossomed, he suggests. Then you can read in the books of Isaiah and Jeremiah about how water will come to the desert.

Visitors to Israel also have the opportunity to do something spiritually searching. "Israel is the source of faith, and you can visit the four holy cities of the Jewish tradition: Jerusalem, Tiberias, Safed and Hebron."

In addition to historical marvels, the Jewish state offers some of the finest dining in the world. "Israel can compete with any restaurant around the world," Esakov says. "One tends to think of fine dining as something not to be found in a kosher kitchen, but we can prove that wrong in Israel."

With Go Israel travel, any visitor to Israel is in the hands of experts. "With our network of connections, we will ensure that a person has an incredible experience. Bar mitzvah tours have been the same old story for 30 years, so we've put together Family Adventure Bar Mitzvah tours that are different and fresh because they address children's needs," Esakov said.

"Our tours give kids the opportunity to experience Israel with water and hands-on activities like eating in Bedouin tents and riding camels. These experiences are all included in the family adventure."

The best time of year to travel to Israel is in March because everything is in full bloom, he says, but "summer vacation and winter break are great time to take kids as well."

The cheapest times to visit is the end of October and into November, as well as January through February, but Esakov advises trying to visit during a Jewish holiday.

"To be in Israel during a Jewish holiday is an unbelievable experience," he said. "If you go to the supermarket, the whole place is kosher for Passover."

Hiring a party planner no longer a luxury

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

"A wedding should be the bride and groom's big day," says party planner Sharon Goodman (905-731-7786).

This basic idea is central to a one of the event industry's fastest-growing areas – wedding planning. Goodman, who's been organizing weddings for 18 years, says more party planners pop up all the time, but she's not upset. "There's plenty of work out there for everybody," she adds.

The reason why more people are getting into the party-planning business, says Goodman, is that it is no longer a luxury to hire someone to take care of your big day, as it once was.

"It's a necessity," she says. "You spend a year of your life planning a phenomenal affair and the evening unfolds and you need to take care of it. You should get someone else to worry about the night and enjoy your evening."

Besides making sure the bride, groom and their parents don't have to stress over the wedding day, a wedding planner's job is to guide the couple through the entire wedding process, which can take a full year.

"I organize right from the beginning, usually when a couple gets engaged," says Lynn Cohen (905-889-1007), a party planner who's been in the business for 30 years. "If they need assistance booking professionals like the band, the photographer, the décor – I'm at their disposal."

While the pre-wedding planning is a lot of work, both Goodman and Cohen have their hands full on the actual day of the event.

"I'm the ringleader, so everyone follows what I do that day," says Goodman. "Everyone gets an itinerary that I make for them, so we're all on the same page."

Cohen says she's there "from the time the bride gets dressed for pictures." She also hands out itineraries to the families and the venue staff. "I want to make sure everything runs smoothly. Almost every minute of the day is planned."

All this organizing might sound stressful, but says Cohen, the wedding day is the easiest part of planning a wedding.

That is unless something goes wrong. During the May long weekend, a bride called Cohen at 8:30 in the morning in a panic.

"Her hairdresser didn't show up. I called around and got somebody." While the day's schedule was off by just a few minutes, the wedding went off without a hitch. Glitches like this one is precisely why it's important to hire a wedding planner.

"Sometimes there's not enough tablecloths or the wrong colour for something arrives," says Goodman. "But these are fixable. I take a folder with me with all the numbers in the industry, so if I have to, I can speak with people during the day. If something does go wrong, if I can, I avoid telling the bride and groom. I'll take care of any little thing."

Since Goodman and Cohen have been in the industry for decades, they've seen trends come and go. They both point out that weddings haven't deviated too much from the standard setup, but what has changed is who's planning the affair.

"Weddings are being planned more and more by the kids," says Goodman. "When I got married, I didn't say a word. A lot of the brides and grooms that I speak to, they're professionals, they have their own ideas."

Cohen adds that "brides and grooms are definitely older. Years ago they were much younger and it was the parents who planned the whole wedding."

Another trend both planners are seeing is a move toward more lavish events.

"They've gone back to bigger parties," says Cohen. "In the early '90s, when the economy wasn't as good, people who could afford a big party still tended to downsize. Now, the economy is better and maybe people are saying, 'Let's celebrate on happy occasions.'"

While Goodman's main business is Jewish weddings, she'll plan non-Jewish affairs, too. Surprisingly, planning a non-Jewish event is different from organizing a Jewish one.

It's not that it's hard to plan, but you want to make sure you know what you're doing, so I research. When I go into a wedding, I'm very prepared."

Jewish or non-Jewish, Goodman says engagements usually last a year, but that's not always the case.

"We can plan a wedding in six months if you wanted to. I've planned a wedding in three months."

Although Goodman and Cohen are experts in wedding planning, it's not all they do. Both are hired to plan bar and bat mitzvahs and corporate events. Cohen also puts on three bridal shows a year.

"A lot of my customers come out to these shows," she says. "The photographers, the bands, everybody's out there."

For someone who organizes weddings for a living, Cohen must really enjoy her job if she's putting on events about weddings.

"I love what I do," she says. "It's a happy time, it's a joyful time and I love to make people's dreams come true."

Goodman's also passionate about her work.

"After 18 years I truly love what I do. When that day unfolds for me, it's fantastic."

Leaving LEGO, and childhood, behind

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

With my youngest son's bar mitzvah just a few days away, I am trying to take stock of this important rite of passage. As my baby crosses that spiritual threshold to adulthood, I am on the lookout for significant signs of maturity.

Physically, there's no question that my son is growing older. He's taller, his voice has dropped an octave or two, and there's an inkling of a moustache lurking on his upper lip.

But the emotional milestones of puberty are more nebulous and much more difficult to detect. This has been the case for all three of my sons.

What's different this time? At first glance, very little. The sibling bickering is neverending. And prying my son(s) away from the television, the computer and the Xbox continues to be the No. 1 domestic challenge in my house.

But there is one subtle shift in behaviour I have only recently, and belatedly, begun to notice. It is perhaps the most telling sign that my son is growing up. He doesn't play with his LEGO any more.

His upcoming bar mitzvah heralds the end of the LEGO years in my home – and for me the end of an age of innocence.

As most people probably know, LEGO, the interlocking brick building toy, has long been a popular plaything, particularly for boys. LEGO sets – many have hundreds of tiny moulded plastic pieces – come in an infinite number of themes from Stars Wars to Harry Potter to medieval castle and rocketships.

We raised three LEGO enthusiasts, and our house became inundated with LEGO. Between birthdays and Chanukah, there was not a LEGO set that we didn't own.

Yet, LEGO was the bane of my existence. The little pieces would get everywhere.

My husband used to joke that he had permanent grooves in the bottom of his feet from stepping on the boys' LEGO.

You couldn't sit down on a chair or a couch or walk across a room without disrupting some sort of LEGO military campaign that one of the boys had launched.

No matter what set they came from, little miniature men – soccer players, astronauts, cowboys and medieval knights – would be conscripted into a ragtag army engaged in battles on every flat surface in the house.

That led to constant squabbling between my sons over which piece belonged to whom. We had battalions of these little men, and somehow my guys would be fighting over the same little piece. It would drive me crazy.

That and the mess. I often threatened to get rid of the LEGO, but none of it ever made it to Goodwill. The truth is, I had too much money tied up in it to give it away. If I had invested as much in real estate as I did in LEGO, I'd probably be a rich woman today.

But the LEGO construction boom in my household eventually subsided. The older boys, now 16 and 18, lost interest in LEGO some years back, much to the great delight of my youngest son.

All the LEGO was his. Baskets and bins overflowing with the little plastic moulded bits filled every shelf in his room. Most of the stuff was usually on the floor. He would rush home from school to build a fort or town or castle in his bedroom. LEGO was his passion.

But in recent years, his LEGO time had become very much a closet activity, because most of his friends had already packed up their LEGO or passed it on to younger siblings.

But now that I think about it, I haven't seen my son play with his LEGO for quite some time. I'm constantly picking up after him, but it's been months since I picked up a LEGO man off his floor or stubbed my toe on a LEGO truck, plane or battleship.

I think the signs have all been there for awhile, but I've been slow to notice that my son's interest in LEGO has waned.

With all my complaining about the LEGO mess, I must confess those years were actually very special times. But now I must "leggo" of the LEGO era, which means recognizing that my youngest son – my baby – is growing up.

PARTY PLANNER

Quality linens make a great gift

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Wouldn't it be easier to buy the bride and groom the ultimate gift if you knew exactly what they wanted?

That is precisely what gift registries are all about.

By setting up a list of items they need for their new home, a couple can map out a shopping list for their guests. In turn, the guests have an easier time making a selection and gain peace of mind knowing the gift they buy is actually what the bride and groom want.

One of the most common types of products couples register for is linens, such as towels, bed coverings and table accessories.

Deblins has been selling quality linens since 1977 and offers clients bridal registry services.

They have the choice of either taking items with them as soon as they buy them or storing them until a later date.

Or, a party guest can purchase a gift card that can be applied to the registry.

Deblins has been selling quality linens since 1977.

"We have a massive selection of contemporary brands," says Ellis Chitiz, president of Deblins.

"Green, purple, orange ... people aren't scared of colours anymore," he says.

"And we offer a special fabric that won't absorb stains."

Another fabric that Chitiz says clients are gravitating to is mesh, the same fabric used to make outdoor furniture.

"It's great for parties because you just wipe it clean," he says.

At David's Fine Linens, you'll find high-end linens from the top producers in Italy and the Middle East.

"We are into luxurious lines, the top brands in the world," says David Saini, owner of David's Fine Linens, adding that his company has been in business for more than two decades.

If you're shopping for household linens or linens that you'll be using at a party, Chitiz encourages you to take measurements before you go to the store.

"If they have a measurement with them, we can then work out what size cloth they need," he says.

"They can also bring in a plate or saucer to help them select colours. This makes things much easier."

For large functions, Deblins carries banquet-size table coverings that measure up to 216 inches long.

To learn more about Deblins products and services, call 416-782-2910 or visit the company online at www.deblins.com.

Give a party that will 'wow' the guests

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Shortly after Natasa and Nebojsa Stojkovic opened The Artistic Way (416-760-9027), their storefront art school at 1003 Eglinton Ave. W., a couple of local parents asked if the Stojkovics could run a camp during Passover.

"We had just opened in March," recalls Nebojsa Stojkovic. "My wife and I agreed to run the camp. We started with two children. By the time the week was up, we had 12. Most of them were boys."

He feels that this was an auspicious beginning for the new community art school. "We had a wonderful time."

The Artistic Way, across the street from the Village Shul, a couple of blocks east of the Allen Expressway, is offering a variety of services, including drop-in paint-your-own-ceramics, ceramic painting and art party packages for all age groups, fine art classes for adults and children, clay animation classes, and arts-based camp programs for the summer and school holidays.

Stojkovic explains that what makes the Artistic Way different from other paint-your-own ceramic places is that he and his wife are both professional artists. Between them, they have training in graphic arts, painting, ceramics, mosaics and clay animation or claymation. "I want to teach the children how to do their own short animated film with claymation."

The Artistic Way also has professional artists giving classes – they start Sept. 28 – in painting, life drawing and hand-building and wheel work in pottery, says Stojkovic. "We want to establish ourselves as a community-based art school.

He adds that he will also be running special one-day workshops.

The birthday parties are two hours long – one hour is devoted to painting, ceramics or other art projects, the second hour is for refreshments, he says. "We offer a few packages. People can choose more expensive ceramic pieces, depending on the package.

"There's also an art party package. The children make their own sculptures and we fire them in the kiln."

The Artistic Way provides the paper plates and cups for the parties, says Stojkovic. "We let our clients bring in their own food."

The children's parties, which have a 10-child minimum charge, can accommodate up to 20 children.

For special occasions, Stojkovic says he will combine the store's upper and lower levels for larger parties. "We're doing a corporate party for 35."

He says he will also be expanding the space in the summer by opening up the backyard patio.

The Artistic Way also offers paint-your-own drop in services from 11 a.m. to 6 p.m. daily, he notes, adding that he carries a wide selection of Judaic greenware – menorahs, Passover plates, and mezuzot.

Stojkovic stresses that the camp program – people will have a full or half-day option – is an art program; the emphasis will be on learning new skills in painting and pottery.

The Stojkovics will be running after-school art programs at local schools such as Leo Baeck.

For more information visit the website at artisticway.ca or e-mail them at art@artisticway.ca.

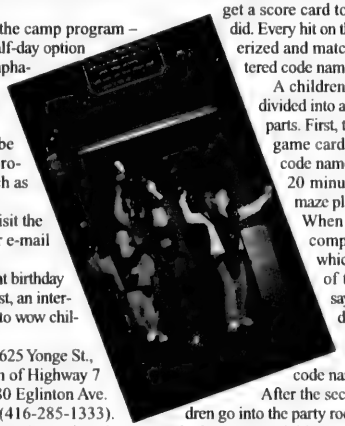
Laser Quest is located 9625 Yonge St., in Richmond Hill just north of Highway 7 (905-883-6000) and at 1980 Eglinton Ave. E., near Warden Avenue (416-285-1333). There are two other GTA locations – in Mississauga and Brampton.

Marketing manager Arlene Duncan describes Laser Quest as a game of hide and seek and tag, played in a multi-level maze. The 7,000-square-foot maze is lit by a black light. "Nobody knows who you are when you're in the maze," she says.

Indeed, everyone chooses a code name.

Players all wear vests with flashing sets of sensors that are activated by laser beams fired by their opponents' laser guns. "You score points by tagging an opponent with the laser beam," Duncan explains.



"There are places to hide. If you get targeted, you have five seconds to get away and hide."

The players spend 20 minutes in the maze and get a score card to see how well they did. Every hit on the sensor is computerized and matched with the registered code name, she says.

A children's party is typically divided into a number of different parts. First, the children get their game cards and register their code names. They then spend 20 minutes in the laser tag maze playing the first game. When it's over they compare score cards, which is an integral part of the interactive fun, says Duncan. The children then register for a second game and may change their code names at that time.

Duncan advises people to allot an hour for the game-playing and an hour to 45 minutes for the second half of the party. "Two hours is the maximum time."

She notes that Laser Quest has no food services on the premises. "You're welcome to bring in or order whatever you like. That's great for kosher food."

By JESSICA FREIMAN
CJN Intern

With its ability to let you share a special day with 150 to a thousand of your closest friends, the Fairmont Royal York Hotel (www.fairmont.com/royalyork/) has something for everyone.

"Whether it's a bar mitzvah, a boutique wedding or a large affair, we have elegant spaces to create an enchanted evening," says the hotel's assistant director of catering sales, Lisa LeGrand.

LeGrand says that wedding ceremonies and dinner with dancing are both popular choices for couples.

"We have a very grand ballroom with 21-foot-high ceilings with gilded gold, which makes a fabulous ceremony room for larger weddings," she says. "Then for the dinner dance, we move to the concert hall. The acoustics are great, and there is a large dance space for all the horahs."

The concert hall can accommodate up to 500 guests for dinner and dancing.

The Fairmont Royal York stands out as a unique venue because of "the elegance of the rooms themselves, the quality of our staff, and the dedication of our service," LeGrand says.

Many high-end events take place at the Fairmont Royal York, and LeGrand takes care that guests are greeted in style.

"We literally roll out the red carpet for guests entering a function," she says. "As well, we provide valet parking."

"There is a lot of nostalgia associated with the Imperial Room. Frank Sinatra performed there. It has old-time charm, and seats between 150 and 250 guests," notes LeGrand.

"Our objective is to turn moments into memories," she says.

The Fairmont Royal York offers outside kosher catering, and also provides its own "kosher-style" food services.

For weddings, there are bedecken rooms available. As well, the hotel offers accommodations for out-of-town guests to stay for the weekend. Brunches on the day after the wedding in the hotel are popular for those with visiting family.

Bar and bat mitzvahs at the Fairmont Royal York are held in one of its four ballrooms, and there are separate small rooms attached to some of the halls for children's activities. "If there is a karaoke machine or games, the rooms off to the side are a great way to entertain the kids away from the main ballroom area," suggests LeGrand.

The most in-demand times of year for Jewish functions in the ballrooms are Saturday nights from October to November, and Sundays from April to May. LeGrand recommends booking a space eight months in advance for a smaller occasion. For a larger event, a year in advance is recommended.

Ketubot and other fine gifts for every simchah

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Are you looking for a ketubah or other gifts with a uniquely Jewish character for a bat or bar mitzvah, wedding, anniversary or other simchah? Contact Jessica Black-Grosman of jessyjudaica (416-398-4432; toll free 1-888-884-3004; www.jessyjudaica.com). In Toronto, ketubah viewings can also be arranged by appointment.

The ketubah has a long and honourable history. It is both a legal document – a written marriage contract according to Halachah – and a medium for art, in calligraphy and illuminated text.

The ketubah dates from the Babylonian exile. Traditionally, though written in the Hebrew alphabet, the text is in Aramaic. There is traditional wording preferred by Orthodox and Conservative rabbis, but Sephardim and Ashkenazim use different texts.

jessyjudaica carries all texts: Orthodox, Reform, Conservative with Lieberman clause, interfaith and anniversary. They also offer English and Hebrew calligraphy for custom texts, as well as translations. And each ketubah is a limited edition, signed and numbered by the artist.

Black-Grosman will prepare any type of ketubah, including those with special text requests. And she notes that a growing number of non-Jews find the idea of a ketubah attractive.

Motifs range from the simple to the elaborate. There are Jewish themes as diverse as the Song of Solomon and Marc Chagall's paintings of lovers. Nature motifs, with flowers and other symbols of new beginnings, are also popular.

During the middle years of the 20th century, the custom of having a ketubah inscribed was falling into disuse. It never died out altogether, however, and in the '80s, the practice was revived. It continues to grow and spread in popularity.

Over the centuries, when having a ketubah was a matter of course, not every one was a crafted work of art: some were quite plain, with nothing but the required text. With the revival of interest, most couples want their ketubah to be artistically inspired, a thing of beauty.

Black-Grosman, who founded jessyjudaica in 1998, says her business increases every year. That same year, she teamed up with ketubah artist Marion Zimmer.

Grosman-Black refers clients to Zimmer for one-of-a-kind ketubot, and also wholesales her work. jessyjudaica has over 120 styles on the website, from $100 up. With a growing demand for Sephardi texts, it now has more than 30 Sephardi styles.

Giclée printing, a new reproduction method that looks hand-done, is popular for ketubot. This technique sprays pigment onto a surface, producing one copy at a time. It lets the artist be more creative, not having to worry about the high cost of producing a print run. For the client, this cuts the cost.

Grosman-Black, who plans to become a one-stop wedding shop, offers a wide range of other gifts and interesting keepsakes for simchahs. She hand-picks all the items herself. Translation is done by native Israeli speakers of Hebrew. And service is heimisch and friendly.

Among the gifts available are Hebrew name necklaces, which are ideal bat mitzvah gifts. jessyjudaica also carries mezuzot, Hebrew name rings and other jewelry.

Grosman-Black carries a new wholesale line of satin and silk kippot from Asia. She also offers "photo-kippahs" as mementoes of an event. Plain on the outside, the kippah has a photo inside – of the bride and groom, the bar mitzvah boy, etc.

jessyjudaica will also make a memento of the glass the groom breaks at the wedding. They will rebuild the shards into the shape of the glass, as closely as possible, and imbed the glass in a lucite cube.

Give jessyjudaica a photo, and the staff will turn it into a painting. The bride and groom at a wedding, for example, can give each of their parents a thank-you gift in the form of the parents' wedding pictures transformed into a richly textured oil painting. Alternatively, a selection of Judaic art prints is also available.

Give away a celebrity, or lip gloss with a conscience

By JESSICA FREIMAN
CJN Intern

Have you ever imagined hosting a party and inviting your dream guest list – say, pop star Beyonce Knowles, Hollywood legend James Dean, screen siren Marilyn Monroe and scientist Albert Einstein?

Now you can. Your simchah will be the talk of the town when these very special guests attend, despite the fact some of them are no longer with us.

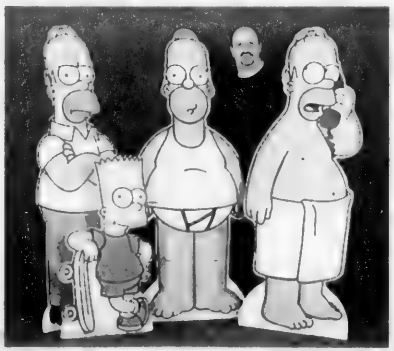
Gord Cohen of Hollywood Standups (hollywoodstandups.com) is the man who can make your dream a reality. He sells life-sized cardboard cutouts of Hollywood celebrities and cartoon characters.

"Our specialty is bringing famous people to your parties. We position the cutouts around the venue at the party. They're a great conversation piece," Cohen says.

"For my own son's bar mitzvah, we took pictures of the kids posing with the characters and gave them the photos to take home as a souvenir."

Equally popular, according to Cohen, is giving away the cutouts as bar mitzvah giveaways. The stars also add an authentic touch to themed parties.

"By far, our most popular cardboard characters are Peter and Stewie Griffin from the cartoon Family Guy," Cohen says. Homer Simpson is also a favourite.



As well, Cohen offers Superman, wrestling, Star Wars, and Disney characters, to name a few.

The life-sized cardboard characters are between five and six feet tall. "When guests see something or someone they recognize, it draws them into the event," says Cohen.

Having Humphrey Bogart standing next to the appetizer table or Elvis next to the coat check is sure to amuse your guests.

Cohen, the self-proclaimed Canadian talent agent for the cutouts, also customizes cardboard pictures of the bar or bat mitzvah boy or girl. "We can also attach a sign-in board to the customized cutout of the child," he says.

All cutouts fold in half and have an easel on the back that props up the characters. Prices range from $29.95 to $39.95, and Cohen recommends ordering two to four weeks ahead of your simchah via the website or at 416-491-2333.

Theme parties have increased in popularity for bar and bat mitzvah children, and Tammy Heisel of Artistic Creations (www.tammyswebsite.ca) is no stranger to this trend. After more than 14 years at the helm of this event-planning and décor company, Heisel has expanded from her base in London, Ont., to include upstate New York.

"Artistic Creations specializes in everything from invitations to complete room decoration to party favours for your function," Heisel says. "But our specialty is theme décor."

"Ninety per cent of what we do is hand-designed, so clients come up with their own themes and designs for a truly customized occasion – from sports to cartoons to Judaic themes for bar and bat mitzvahs," she says.

The Artistic Creations website is a virtual storehouse of everything you need to plan a function. For weddings, seating cards, floral arrangements, chocolates, limousines and centrepieces are just some of what Heisel has to offer. For bar and bat mitzvahs, it's props, balloons, lighting and name signs, among other things.

A giveaway popular with bar mitzvah-age children is Heisel's own creation, a lip gloss called Curing Kisses. For orders of 50 lip glosses or more, Artistic Creations will make a donation to a charity of the bar or bat mitzvah child's choosing. As well, the lip glosses come personalized with the child's name and the charity that he or she is supporting.

Artistic Creations serves Toronto and surrounding areas in Ontario and can be accessed online or by calling 519-672-1855.

Need a cool party accessory? Rent it!

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

No matter the size or type of affair you're hosting, a bounty of accessories are typically needed to dazzle your guests and enhance an event.

From chairs and table linens, to dinnerware or even the chupah at a wedding, the items required to make a special function complete aren't likely to be found at the corner store.

That's why renting them is a convenient and practical approach.

"If, for example, you're having a dinner party and you need wine glasses, you can rent them for your party and when you're done, you just empty them and return them without even washing."

In business since 1911, Chair-man Mills provides a range of items for rent, including tables, chairs, china, candles and much more.

Crothers says people often want to be unique with their table set-ups and do so by having unusually shaped and coloured plates, for instance.

"Square shaped plates are big and lots of colours are trendy," Crothers says.

"If you have more variety as far as the décor is concerned, you make your party more unique. And it can add a little pizzazz without costing a lot of money."

Crothers advises clients to go to a party rental showroom to see what's available.

Then, you can work in tandem with a salesperson to make selections that are both in line with your budget and match your theme.

"We'll work within your budget to get something that works without costing a fortune," she says.

The months of June, September and December are busy times of the year at Chair-man Mills, as are Jewish holidays such as Passover, so be sure to book rentals well in advance if your event falls during those months.

Just as wine glasses and chairs are imperative at a wedding, so too is the chupah, the traditional canopy that the bride and groom stand under during the wedding ceremony and symbolizes the new home they are starting.

To make the ceremony especially touching and dynamic, many couples are opting to rent chupahs adorned with vibrant designs.

"One theme we have is old Jerusalem, with a mountain and the Western Wall in the background and the seven blessings written in Hebrew calligraphy," says Moshe Saadon, owner of Chuppahs 4 Rent.

The chupahs are silk with satin backing, and because there are eight in Saadon's collection, he says clients have an easy time finding colours that match with motifs from their wedding, such as the bridal parties' colours.

Beyond traditional or Judaic themes, Saadon says he also offers a chupah adorned with a heart which doesn't have religious symbols or Hebrew lettering.

"The heart is a universal theme and it's suitable for a multicultural ceremony," he says.

Saadon encourages clients to contact him three to six months in advance of their affair.

In addition to the chupah rental, his services include delivering the chupah, setting it up and taking it down.

To reach Chair-man Mills, phone 416-391-0400 or log onto www.chairmanmills.com.

Visit Chuppahs 4 Rent at www.chuppahs4rent.com or call Moshe Saadon at 905-886-4969 or 416-277-4222.

Park Hyatt offers luxury with competitive catering pricing

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN

A hotel is an ideal venue for sophisticated affairs and one of the most elegant in the Greater Toronto Area is the Park Hyatt Hotel (416-925-1234), just south of Toronto's Yorkville district.

The Park Hyatt, located near the northwest corner of Bloor Street and Avenue Road, offers great service, says Michael Rosen, director of catering. "Whether it's a bar or bat mitzvah or a wedding, every party gets the five-star treatment. That's what we're all about."

And while the Park Hyatt is in the luxury class of hotels, the catering prices are quite reasonable, says Rosen. "It's a misconception that we're expensive. Our prices are very competitive in the kosher marketplace.

"For the service and quality of the food and the luxurious surroundings, we offer great value."

He says there are several party venues within the hotel to choose from. The Roof Salon on 18th floor is ideal for more intimate gatherings. The room can accommodate 115 for a sit-down dinner with dancing or 140 people for a dinner or a luncheon without dancing.

He adds that in the winter, the ambience of the room is enhanced by the fireplace. "It adds so much warmth to an already beautiful space."

Rosen notes that the Queen's Park Ballroom seats 270 to 280 people comfortably with dancing. "We typically give people space for the ceremony. We don't charge for the space if we're charging for food and beverage."

He says clients are in very good hands with Donald Hillis, the social catering manager. "Donald did high-end, off-premises catering for years. He is so likable.

"He recently did a kosher wedding for 200 people. The bride was ecstatic about the food and service, but it was more about the personal touches and the attention she was given by Donald. We call him our resident wedding specialist."

Rosen says clients can expect exceptional service. "What distinguishes us is the extent of our service. It's unprecedented in a hotel."

He attributes this high quality in part to the large number of staff on hand for any affair.

"We understand that when you're making a wedding, you only have one shot. There's no hit or miss. At the Park Hyatt, it's consistently perfect.

"We like to say we serve up perfect events."

> Serving up perfect events

Rosen says the food presentation and quality is very impressive for a hotel. "The greatest compliment we get is how good our food is. We provide restaurant quality and presentation for food served at a banquet."

He credits the accomplished executive chef for setting the high standard for all the food served at the Park Hyatt. "Joan Monfaredi oversees the kosher kitchen as well. The same chef is cooking for everyone at the hotel. Everyone gets the same VIP treatment.

"The same talented crew in the five-star restaurant works in the kosher kitchen. We can do that because we're a smaller hotel. We're not a convention hotel. We are more of a boutique-style hotel."

Monfaredi can create any menu style, whether it's an eight-course dinner or food stations, says Rosen. "Every event is customized."

He stresses that whenever there's a kosher affair, a mashgiach is on site for the whole event. "From prep to clean-up, everything is supervised."

Kosher dinners start at $70 per person, he says, explaining that the hotel is able to keep the cost of kosher events down because it has its own kosher china and cutlery. "Because we own our own dishes and flatware, it's less expensive than other venues where they have to bring in all the rentals."

Weddings held at the Park Hyatt include a complimentary deluxe guest room for the bride and groom, he adds.

Rosen says the hotel is offering a special program

One Perfect Day, Two Perfect Nights – for couples holding weddings at the Park Hyatt before June 30, 2007. "Book and hold the wedding at the Park Hyatt Toronto, and the couple will enjoy two complimentary nights at any Hyatt resort or any Park Hyatt Hotel worldwide.

Deluxe spa opens at B.C.'s Sun Peaks Resort

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to the CJN

Spa Life

Last September, aromatherapist and esthetician Kim Berardine opened Pinnacle's Essential Spa in the Pinnacle Lodge and Spa.

The Pinnacle Lodge and Spa is less than one hour away from Kamloops, B.C., in Sun Peaks Resort, the second largest ski resort area in the province, next to Whistler.

The walls of Pinnacle's Essential Spa are painted a soothing pale yellow and accented with warm wood trim. The main room houses a waiting area, a small retail space and pedicure and manicure corners, by a picture window facing Mount Morrissey. There is one softly lit treatment room.

"The spa is intimate," says Berardine. "When you book your treatment, it becomes your spa, which is unique. You are not sharing it with anyone, unless you invite people to come with you to the spa.

"I have another esthetician available for group bookings. I can also bring in a hairstylist for weddings," she adds.

Upon advance request, Berardine offers limited treatments including massage, manicures, pedicures and mini facials for two or more guests in guests' rooms. For outcalls, she adds an additional $25 to her fee.

The Pinnacle Lodge and Spa overlooks the Graham Cooke, scenic 18-hole Sun Peaks Resort's golf course, at the ninth hole. In the summer, Berardine plans to put a massage chair there and offer services to help people relax before, after and perhaps during their game.

Pinnacle's Essential Spa offers an à la carte service menu, but Berardine will custom package her services to suit her clients' needs. Clients can even book a time period and not a service, and decide what they are in the mood for on the day of their appointment.

The spa's services include massage, hot-stone massage therapy, aromatherapy and reiki. Body treatments on offer are Dead Sea Salt Scrub & Nourishing With Body Butter; and Relaxing Herbal Body Wrap & Warm Detoxifying Massage Blend. The body treatments are popular with the ski enthusiasts who populate the resort in the winter months.

Other body treatments offered by the spa include Organic Clay Body Mask & Skin Tight Body Butter; Muscle Relief Seaweed Gel Wrap & Soothing Body Butter; and Exfoliating Massage & Body Bronzing Treatment.

In addition to a number of specialized facials, Berardine offers hand and foot treatments including paraffin dips and Epsom salt soaks, which are particularly good for sore muscles after a day on the slopes or golfing.

Also available are lash and brow tinting, makeup applications and body and face waxing. With three or more services, clients are given a 10 per cent discount. Spa lunches can also be included.

"For facials I use a Spanish product line called Skeynor. It has been around since the 1960s," Berardine says.

"I use foot products from Germany – Gehwol and Applresan. Both are targeted for specific foot treatments like cracks or eczema on the feet. For nail products, I use OPI and Zaya, and for makeup, I use MAC."

The Pinnacle Lodge and Spa has been under new ownership since June. The new owners of the lodge and spa are Quebec native Andree McKenzie, its general manager, and her chef husband, Craig, from New Zealand.

The Pinnacle Lodge and Spa includes 20 suites, all with private balconies and amazing views of the mountains or golf course. Each suite has a soaker tub and, for warmth, a gas fireplace and heated bathroom floor, which is much appreciated on winter nights.

Resort amenities include a sauna, fitness area, outdoor hot tub and skating rink in the winter. The resort has ski/golf storage and designated pet-friendly rooms. All-inclusive ski packages are offered.

Sun Peaks Resort gained prominence about 11 years ago, when Olympic gold and silver medallist Nancy Greene Raine and her husband, Al, opened Nancy Greene's Cahilty Lodge, a hotel/condominium.

Winter outdoor activities at Sun Peaks Resort include skiing, dog-sled tours, ice skating, sleigh rides and snowmobiling. Summer activities include golfing, mountain biking and hiking.

For more information on Pinnacle's Essential Spa, phone 250-371-7376 or toll free, 866-578-7850, or visit www.pinnaclelodgesunpeaks.com.

The spa offers many types of services.

A great band gets people dancing

By JENNA ROSMAN
CJN Intern

A great band not only emanates energy and gives solid performances but also inspires the audience to get up and dance.

"We know how to put on a good show," she says. "But it's not about the band, it's about the people out there – giving them the best show they'll ever see in their life."

The 42nd Street band consists of seven members, including a female and a male lead vocalist, a saxophone player, a drummer, a guitarist and a bass guitarist. Ordel says the band receives letters of praise after most events because they draw people out of their shells and on to the dance floor.

"Say you have 250 people. Half are really with it and the other half are really quiet. The band has to be able to read the audience and be able to get them up and dance," she says. "It's up to the band to encourage them."

Ordel says that it's crucial for "a band to have a good time making sure you have a good time."

Even during trying times, such as the massive summer blackout three years ago, the 42nd Street Band has remained determined and steadfast in their dedication to please a client.

"We were scheduled to do a performance at a prestigious place during the blackout. I had no gas in my car, and the party concerned was very concerned. I said to them, 'No matter what there'll be a wedding, even if they have to sing a cappella or we use a big ghetto blaster, there'll be a wedding,'" she said. "And the day before the wedding, the power returned and the wedding was beautiful."

Sarah Morrison & The Dog's Life band (416-880-1795, www.sarahmorrison.ca, info@sarahmorrison.ca) is another act that is worth checking out.

Morrison, the dynamic lead singer, is the celebrity vocal coach on Canadian Idol and the singing coach and judge on the Canadian television show Popstars.

She is backed up by a five-piece band, which includes a drummer, bassist, keyboardist and guitarist. The band can add additional members, including a saxophonist, trumpet, tenor saxophonist, trombone and a male vocalist.

"You get the same sound whether they have a five to six-piece or if they have an eight- to nine-piece band – it's more of an energy level," says Morrison.

Like Ordel, Morrison says a band must bring people on to the dance floor, something that a DJ may not be able to achieve.

"A band and a DJ are two completely separate things," says Morrison. "A DJ is a background thing where you either get up and dance or you don't. The thing about a band is that it's an entertaining thing, so even if they don't dance, they can watch and still walk away from an event fulfilled."

Morrison knows how to read the crowd and what can make or break a party.

"First and foremost, have the bar in the room. People spend a lot of money on live entertainment and then don't put the bar in the room," she says. "People have often been standing around or sitting for hours, so by the time the band starts, the first thing they want is a drink, and you don't want to make your guests choose between one and the other."

Morrison, who grew up with Alanis Morissette in Ottawa, says low lighting is another way to make guests feel comfortable, as people are less self-conscious in it.

"These factors aren't thought about, but if you manipulate them you can influence how the party goes," she says.

Morrison encourages her clients to bring her new material to add to her performance list "so that their event is special."

Morisson says the band is the one part of an event that guests never forget.

"It may not be the highest priority, but it's one of the most memorable, that both the bride and groom as well as their guests will remember," she says.

"You won't remember the colour of the flowers or those details, but you always remember the band. It's a very important thing."

PARTY PLANNER

Finding your perfect look at the salon

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

Up-dos, short-dos, long-dos – with so many choices out there, how is a girl ever to choose!

With the party season quickly approaching, it may be time to get your hair done in the most elegant fashion or just simply update your look. But hairstylists are dime a dozen… or so you may think. Since your hair plays such an important part in your overall appearance, selecting an excellent hairstylist can be one of the most important (and tough!) decisions you make. Among the best services in Toronto, two salon and spas stand out.

Mane Society Salon & Spa (www.manesociety.com) operates full-service salons and spas, with five locations in and around Toronto. Breathing fresh air into the hairstyling industry, Mane Society offers a wide array of unique hair and spa services.

Recently husband-and-wife team Jeff and Cheryl Benoliel partnered with star hairstylist Mickey S., who heads the Mane Society chain. The Benoliels are contributing their marketing and business skills to the three-year-old business.

World-renowned hairstylist Mickey S. brings his talents to his loyal clients, and welcomes new clients as well. He travels the world styling the hair of the rich and famous and just returned from Jordan, where he showed his talents to the king and queen, at the queen's request no less! Mickey S., with celebrity clients in the United States and Canada, can be booked through Mane Society. To ensure a spot with Mickey, be sure to book at least two to three weeks in advance.

Among the hottest hair services offered at Mane Society, Cheryl Benoliel cites extensions made of real hair, a must-have for summer. Often used for special occasions as well, extensions can be transformed into a manifold of shapes. "We can do absolutely anything with them," she says.

Among the most unique spa services at Mane Society is the Seawater Strengthening Therapy, which uses plant antioxidants to help rejuvenate your face. Other spa services include various facials, sea spa manicures and ear candling, which is the holistic process of purifying the inner ear with the use of wax.

Mane Society also caters to wedding and bar/bat mitzvah parties, offering various spa packages, including stress relievers and day-at-the-spa pampering. Just watch your cares float away as Mane Society's expert staff spoils you from head to toe.

Another option in full-service salons is Hair After (416-221-6658), a salon that has been serving its loyal customers for more than 35 years. A family-run business, Hair After boasts three generations of stylists working at the salon. While at the salon, you quickly feel as if you are part of the family. The salon's atmosphere is laid back, and spending a morning or afternoon there is like spending time with old pals. For coffee lovers, the salon offers espresso made fresh from its espresso machine.

While Hair After is owned and run by John Colombo, his son Gian-Paolo Colombo is the star hairstylist of the moment. Voted best newcomer of the year in Canada and nominated for the same title in North America, Gian-Paolo has quite an impressive roster of clients. The team at Hair After also includes Enzo Cascone, a top North American stylist.

With such an expert staff, it's no wonder Hair After has a loyal following. Offering services in all aspects of hair, including cutting, highlighting and wigs – as well as manicuring and massages – the salon staff is aware of all the newest and hottest trends. Familiar with European styles, the salon's staff members truly understand style.

While moving with the trends, Hair After is true to their clients. "I am a firm believer in suitability," says Colombo. "What is in fashion doesn't always suit the customer," he says.

To avoid any hair mishaps, the stylists at Hair After always consult with their clients before touching their hair. Stressing the importance of comfort, Colombo has sketches on hand that relate face shapes to hairstyles.

Catering to larger parties as well, the stylists at Hair After offer specialized looks for bridal and bar/bat mitzvah parties as well. With an understanding of the importance of your special day, they will make sure that you look better than your best.

"Consultation is number one with us," says Colombo. "We take the time to make sure the client is completely happy with what we are doing."

Enthusiasm, trust and selection: great gifts at Lawrence and Bathurst

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

With Mother's Day out of the way, you'd think the gift industry could relax for awhile. Not so, says Shaynee Schwartz, owner of Shaynee's, a multi-purpose gift store in Lawrence Plaza.

"Bridal season is coming up," says Schwartz, "We're also busy during Rosh Hashanah, Chanukah and Passover. We basically run the Jewish calendar."

Buying a bridal gift doesn't have to be expensive, Schwartz says. At Shaynee's, there are presents at every price.

"We have a great range. You can buy something for $5 or something for $300 dollars. Not every store is like that. I find that a lot of people also like our varied amount of product. The way I run the biz is if you come in looking for something and you don't find it, you'll be guaranteed to find something else."

One of Shaynee's best-sellers is anything stainless steel. Schwartz says she's the "stainless steel queen of Toronto" and listening to her talk about the material, you can't help but believe her.

"I really love stainless steel. You don't have to polish it and it looks gorgeous on the table. To be honest, I have increased my stainless steel business every year. The manufacturers were at one time doing silver plates, but they've now diversified into stainless steel. They used to make silver chafing dishes and they're now making stainless steel dishes."

If a bride wants to be certain that she'll get Shaynee's stainless steel products – or the dozens of other items, from menorahs to Alessi products – she can sign up to Shaynee's "big" bridal registry.

Another gift store with a well-stocked bridal registry is KOKLICO Gift Shop, a four-month-old gift store that sells jewelry, tablecloths and even flowers. Kathy Cohen-Ohayon, KOKLICO Gift Shop's owner, started the store after she tired of working as a dental assistant. She felt she could transfer her skills of making patients feel comfortable to the retail arena.

"The dental assistants were trained by going to a lot of conventions and taking courses on how to treat a customer," says Cohen-Ohayon, who was raised in Spain.

"People need that one-on-one contact. I have customers that keep coming because of my service. Somebody's going to leave the store and want to come back to a place where they feel warm and can be listened to. They release whatever problem they have in their mind. Buying a gift is the full experience from the moment you purchase it to the moment you give it."

Like Shaynee's, KOKLICO Gift Shop is located near Lawrence Avenue and Bathurst Street. Because of the location, Cohen-Ohayon thought most of her clients would be Orthodox, but that hasn't been the case.

"I was expecting my clientele to be 90 per cent Orthodox, but I have customers from Thornhill to people who live close to downtown. I'm very pleased I have a little bit of everything."

The reason why KOKLICO Gift Shop and Shaynee's get customers from all over the city is because of trust and comfort.

Some businesspeople who don't have time to get to Shaynee's even ask Schwartz to pick out a gift that a colleague might like.

"People call us, they need a retirement gift, a wedding gift for somebody or to give something to an associate. They'll phone us and we'll ask them a few questions and we'll pick something. It's painless shopping. A lot of people trust us, they trust our tastes."

KOKLICO Gift Shop sells jewelry, tablecloths, flowers and more.

Schwartz, who opened Shaynee's in 1991, adds that tastes have changed over the years. Many of her younger clients are looking for gifts that look interesting and don't resemble anything their mothers might buy.

"People are staying away from silver," she says. "No body wants to polish anymore. Younger people are more casual than their mothers were. They want a little bit of funk, something young. Now they're buying stainless steel, where their mother wouldn't have looked at it."

"Customers want different, they want things that are original," adds Cohen-Ohayon. "We try to work with the customer and find out more about the gift getters personality."

What really makes both of these stores successful isn't their diverse range of items – although that helps. It's their owners' enthusiasm for the gift industry.

"I love working in customer service, and I love decoration," says Cohen-Ohayon. "Making gifts is a passion."

This party planner specializes in babies

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

No one else in Toronto is doing what Adi Amsterdam does. She's a party planner for brises and baby namings, which she handles under the auspices of her interior design company called Amsterdam Design (416-473-1482, adi@amsterdamdesign.net).

She says she would never have foreseen taking up this line of work. At 32, Amsterdam is a mother of a son, Guy, 8, and a daughter, Noy, 6. After having her daughter, she went back to school to complete a program in interior design. She loves the field and has a good eye for detail.

But Amsterdam also loves party planning.

"I'm a people person," she smiles. "Working with people, being able to help them, gives me a high."

In 2005, a friend asked her to plan a bris. She agreed and enjoyed it immensely – as did her friend, who had a stress-free simchah in which all she had to do was show up with the baby.

She got her second client through her mom, who owns the Haymishe Bagel Shop. On a Wednesday, her mother asked her to do the bris, which was to be on the Friday, two days away. Again, Amsterdam agreed.

The event was a success, and the client called her three times to thank her.

"All this," recalls Amsterdam, "led me to remember how it was when I had my boy. It was shaping up to be joyous but stressful, with catering and linens and all the other things to look after. Then some friends and relatives pitched in to do everything for me, and I could relax and enjoy herself."

Milestones, happy or sad, are often overwhelming. A simchah such as a bris is bound to create stress. Usually, you don't know the birthing day in advance, and once the baby is born, the bris usually takes place on the eighth day of life, so parents have to plan a celebration at short notice.

Moreover, parents have to do this while they're sleep-deprived, and while the mother is still tired from giving birth and while the new arrival is asserting his claim to be the centre of the mother's universe.

So Amsterdam knows how much a bris or baby naming planner has to offer parents. A planner gives the mother time to recuperate from giving birth and to bond with her baby.

"As a high-energy person", Amsterdam says, "I'm a natural for taking the stress off a mother's shoulders."

Amsterdam Designs gives you one-stop shopping for your upcoming bris or baby naming. She'll take care of whatever you need: caterers, linens, centrepieces, wait staff, entertainment. As well, her service includes what she calls a "bris kit," with gauze and other items needed for the actual circumcision.

Adi Amsterdam of Amsterdam Design.

As you'd expect, Amsterdam's knowledge also includes lists of mohels, and she also knows such facts as whether a mohel will walk or drive to a Saturday bris.

"Most brises are in the morning and last for a few hours," says Amsterdam. "This means I can work professionally, but have the afternoon free to cook, spend quality time with my kids, drive them to events, and do the other things that are part of being a mother."

Amsterdam's key piece of advice: "Know your budget, and know what you want. I can consult on the budget and make rough estimates. And when it's time to choose your caterer, etc., I have the names and numbers at my fingertips."

Sweeten any gift with chocolate

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

There's nothing like a little sweet talk, especially if it's said with chocolate.

Chocolate sweetens any message or greeting and it's the perfect gift, says Bob Levine, owner of Chocolate Charm (416-787-4256). "I like to say that we make gift giving deliciously easy."

Chocolate Charm, located at 3541 Bathurst St., a few blocks south of Wilson Avenue (across the street from Baycrest), specializes in chocolate truffles, chocolate novelty-shape gifts, baskets and trays and smash cakes.

Levine says people love to get chocolate as gifts because it "is known to be the most universally loved flavour."

Under COR supervision, Chocolate Charm offers both milk and pareve chocolates, all made from Swiss and Belgian chocolate, says Levine.

Chocolate novelty shapes, which Chocolate Charm can personalize and deliver, make wonderful gifts because they're something people would not buy for themselves, he says. "It's more of a fun thing. It's nice to get the shape they like in chocolate... If you like hockey and you get a chocolate hockey stick it's really fun. We have a few hundred different shapes. We have something for everyone."

A big draw for customers are the handmade milk chocolate truffles – chocolates with soft creamy centres encased in a harder chocolate shell – all made from scratch on the premises, says Levine.

He points out that Chocolate Charm employs two full-time chocolate makers, trained in the traditional chocolate methods.

"They don't use any preservatives or artificial ingredients. Our truffles are made with fresh cream, real butter and genuine liqueurs.

"We use a single malt scotch in our Irish cream and real champagne in our champagne truffles. They are by far the most popular truffles in the shop."

Other truffle flavours in big demand include caramel, coffee liqueur and amaretto, he adds.

Chocolate Charms also boasts a large selection of chocolate lollypops, he says. "We have the largest collection of chocolate lollypops in the city. They come in all kinds of shapes – roller blades, baseballs, Jewish stars. They can be used as favours for parties."

He notes that during the holidays, religious symbols are very popular gifts. For example, people like to send chocolate-shaped Torahs and the tablets for Shavuot, chocolate shofars for Rosh Hashanah, and chocolate menorahs and dreidels for Chanukah.

Chocolate flowers have also become very trendy, according to Levine. "Long-stem roses, daisies, tulips and daffodils sent in clay pots make wonderful housewarming and holiday gifts. Our flowers don't wilt."

He says that personalized chocolate champagne bottles are also frequently requested as gifts for special occasions. He recommends that customers give the store a day's notice for personalized items.

Chocolate Charm offers a line of pareve chocolates the most popular is the gianduja, which combines chocolate and hazelnut paste, says Levine. "It's the closest you can get to something tasting like milk chocolate in a pareve chocolate."

Smash cakes, the large, hollow, rectangular box-style cakes, continue to be a common bar mitzvah item, says Levine. "We've doing them since the late '80s.

"For the chocolate box, we use the same high quality European chocolate. We decorate the cake with all kinds of shapes, and the names are all in chocolate. The letters stand up.

"We provide a mallet. You can't cut it. You have to smash it. The cakes have to be hollow in order to be able to smash them."

Even though people are more health conscious, they still like to indulge in chocolate, so Levine says he offers some healthier options such as chocolate covered nuts, dried fruit, almond bark, and 70 per cent dark chocolate.

"The research shows that chocolate is actually good for you. Almond bark is a nice, healthy snack and it's not bad for the heart," Levine says. The store delivers across the GTA. "We get calls from all over the city. People want chocolate without milk because there are so many people who are lactose intolerant.

"We're also a good chocolate shop that happens to be kosher so we attract people from across the city."

Need a drink? Try some 'liquid fruit'

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

If you're thirsty or just low on energy, you might want to juice up with some pure liquid fruit.

Wilde Juice (416-293-8886), the latest entry into the Canadian juice market, is made from pure pressed fruit.

This line of kosher juices from South Africa is not like products from other juice companies, says Peter Wartski, a partner in Twynz Inc., the company that imports and markets the product in Canada.

Most commercial juices are made from concentrates and purees, but Wilde Juice has no added sugars, preservatives or water, explains Wartski. "The juices are so unique and delicious because they're pressed from fruit ripened on the trees. It's not a concentrate mixed with another juice to reconstitute it.

"Wilde juice is like drinking liquid fruit. We are convinced that we are selling the best juice in Canada."

So far, the juices, which come in Elopaks (Tetropak-style packaging with a convenient screw cap), can be found in more than 200 grocery and health food stores in Quebec and Ontario, including Longos, A&P, Dominion, Pusateri's, Whole Foods, Ambrosia, the Big Carrot, and selected Costcos.

The product is also distributed in Alberta and British Columbia, and there are plans to bring it to the United States, says Wartski.

The juices come in 12 flavours – single fruit and blends in a one-litre size – and six flavours are available in a 330-ml size.

"By far, mango is our best seller," says Wartski. "People who taste it love it. You haven't tasted mango juice like this. It's thick and delicious. It's a great product."

Other flavours include wild berry; apple, cranberry and ginger; and mango, orange and cranberry.

"It's a totally natural product. It's pure juice squeezed from the fruit."

For gifts, go to the source, Israeli Source

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Chuck Elnekave of Israeli Source had his first child three weeks before he opened Israeli Source in February 2006. So for him, this has been a year of beginnings.

Israeli Source specializes in Israeli gifts, including lots of Judaica. The store emphasizes unique hand-crafted gifts, mainly individual items. The more artistic handmade work is from Israel, but there are also items from the United States and other countries.

Elnekave benefits from the Canada-Israel free trade agreement. "I intend to expand my Canadian market," he says.

We think of Israeli exports as being based in agriculture, high-technology or medicine and more recently, fashion. What is less well known is that along with these industries, Israel also has many and varied handicrafts. The promotion of handicrafts actually predates the founding of the State of Israel. Under the auspices of the World Zionist Congress, the Bezalel Academy of Art and Design was opened in Jerusalem in 1906.

As his company's name implies, Elnekave buys from Israeli sources whenever possible. "I go to Israel myself to do as much of the buying as I can," he says. "And it's fun, with all the variety offered."

Elnekave's sources within Israel are diverse, ranging from shops and malls to craft fairs around the country. "Israelis like hand-crafted gifts themselves," he observes, "and give the craft artists a lot of local support."

Israeli Source carries a wide range of ceramics, but there's plenty of metalwork as well. You'll find serving plates and candlesticks. There are hamsas, hand-shaped protective amulets, in a range of designs and materials. There are Shabbat and yom tov hot plates, Havdallah sets, and silver plated kiddush cups and fountains, as well as a plethora of jewelry.

Israeli artisans use every imaginable material, a diversity that is reflected in Israeli Source's stock of crafted objects.

There's glass and pewter in abundance. And many craft workers like wood for its warmth and durability and its receptivity to varied treatments. For example, there are hand-painted wooden challah boards in different sizes.

Textiles are well represented, too. There are wall hangings and tapestries; and of course there are Judaica items including challah covers, tallitot, tallit bags and crocheted kippot in assorted designs. With all this variety, Israeli Source is something of a visual and tactile feast.

For those who like to read, the store also offers a wide selection of books – siddurim, Haggadot, Torah and Talmud texts, books on Jewish themes and history, novels and inspirational stories. Hebrew books include Israeli publications, novels and history, travel books, cook books and souvenir or coffe table books with lots o photos.

There are plenty of thing for your kids as well. Book for children include Wal Disney and Dr. Seuss i Hebrew, and there are toys an games. And Israeli Source carries kid-sized kippot.

Do you have a lot of corre spondence with Israel, som of it in Hebrew? On Israel Source's shelves, you can fin useful items like an English Hebrew keyboard. And ther are novelties like mah jon cards.

You shop in a self-serv warehouse, with staff o hand to help. Elnekave has high praise for his staff. "They enjoy being knowledgeable an helpful," he says.

Israeli Source is also a wholesale outlet You'll find it at 60 Doncaster Ave., Unit 1 Thornhill, Ont. It is closed on Saturday. Fo store hours, phone 905-482-2025 or 1-877 613-1818; fax 905-482-2026. Website www.israelisource.com; e-mail info@israelisource.com.

Photojournalist captures the moment forever

By JENNA ROSMAN
Special to The CJN

A Toronto photographer has won the gold medallion from the Artistic Guild of the Wedding Photojournalist Association.

In the first year he has entered, Adam Miasik of Moving Images Photography (http://www.movingimagesphoto.com), won sixth place in the international competition this May, receiving the prestigious gold medallion for his submission in the wedding portrait category.

"I'm a member of the [Wedding Photojournalist Association]. One of the things [they have] are these ongoing contests, three times a year. You enter your work and go from there," he said. "Hopefully it brings attention to [my] work and my profile is raised up a little bit. It's another stepping stone up the ladder."

Miasik has been a photographer for the past 18 years. He opened his business, Moving Images, five years ago.

He described his candid, captivating style as "storytelling," but said that the growing popularity of photojournalism in event photography has become "almost like a catch phrase for a lot of people" or "an excuse for bad photography."

Miasik cited renowned photographers, Norman Parkinson, Robert Doisneau and Henri Cartier as being the "true masters" of photojournalism.

In his own work, Miasik focuses on captivating the atmosphere. "I try to capture the mood of the day, like when the bride and groom see each other for the first time – the little details," he said.

"They all add to the story, to the picture of the day. I hope to convey, if you weren't there, this is what you missed. I really want people to be themselves."

Miasik, whose commercial clients include Premier Fitness, said his technique for capturing such expressive moments is to remain observant and unobtrusive in the background. He said many people are too focused on the expense of hiring a great photographer, rather than on the calibre of the material.

"We've forgotten that these are life memories, too, that will stay with us for the rest of our lives.

"When your children pick up that photo album or look at that portrait, you really want to get a sense of that person," he said. "If you are just looking at a price point, especially with technology today, anybody could just take a picture, but to truly be able to see the person, I think that's what a good photographer is."

Miasik recommends booking up to a year in advance. For more information, contact him at 416-271-1957.

Mint offers 'fresh,new approach' in event consultation'

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

Mint Events takes the bar/bat mitzvah industry to a whole new level.

When Jared Florence was 16, he thought it would be a lot of fun to DJ a friend's party. Little did he know he'd still be entertaining 13-year-old kids a decade and a half later.

Florence is the owner of Mint Events (416-923-6468), a boutique entertainment service that organizes everything from bar and bat mitzvah parties to club openings and charity events. The company has been around for about a year, but Florence has been organizing events for almost 20.

"At first, I would DJ bar mitzvahs. It ended up being once a month, then once a week to twice a week to three or four times a week. It became my way of life."

About six years ago, Florence saw a change in the bar and bat mitzvah industry – people wanted flashier, more elaborate functions – and the budding entrepreneur saw a business opportunity.

"I started to see the potential to take this to another level," he says, "I felt that so much more could be done at these events."

So he hired dancers to entertain the kids, and started planning more elaborate parties.

"At one point there was one company that had 95 per cent of the industry, but then it changed. There were all these other companies," says Florence. "People were spending insane amounts of money. We've done bar and bats where people spend up to $250,000."

To get a bigger share of the business, Florence bought out one of his biggest competitors, Mandell Extreme. He then teamed up with another competitor, Noah Cappe of Superfly Entertainment, and enlisted a friend, Jordan Fogle, and together they created Mint Events.

"This wasn't really new," he says. "It was taking up from where Mandell left off, but what is new is that we're offering a fresh, new approach in event consultation."

That approach involves planning events from start to finish, and not just for bar and bat mitzvahs, but for other, private functions as well. One upcoming event involves flying several people to the Caribbean for three days.

"We're there to orchestrate all the entertainment – people like [singer, dancer, actor] Usher have parties down at this resort. There's the usual things, dancing, dinner, but we're also planning jet skiing to scuba diving to beach volleyball. We'll facilitate everything for them, using all suppliers and people in industry we've become really close with."

One industry Florence has become close with is the entertainment industry. Britney Spears and Paris Hilton are making appearances at a club opening Mint is planning, and they've hired Elton John to play a client's 50th birthday party.

"We're affiliated with all the major agencies in L.A. This client, whose party Elton John's playing at, has given us carte blanche to make this a great evening. There are other parties where my partner has shown up and he's the entertainer, and there are 30 electric guitars to give away."

Despite their success in other areas of party planning, bar and bat mitzvahs take up most of their time. Florence says about 50 per cent of their events are bar and bats.

"People are still spending a lot of money on these events," he says, "but they're now looking for a lot more value with what they get."

The added value, says Florence, is in Mint's experience. He says a lot of DJ operations are "opening overnight," but his company can do a lot more than just throw on some music.

"Mint Events is not specifically a DJ company," he says. "It's a misconception that we're hoping to change. In fact, there's not another company who does what we do. Mint to us is a way of life. We introduced a certain element of style when we started this because we saw Mint as a state of mind. We've come up with a very clean, very slick way of presenting ourselves."

Florence also deserves credit for understanding a constantly changing industry. At his own bar mitzvah, he invited 20 close friends and they danced along to a band. Now, he says, times have changed.

"Kids are a lot smarter and sophisticated now. We're doing parties where on average there are between 70 to 120 kids. The biggest thing is that this generation of kids is going to between 30 and 80 events a year, so our clients want to keep these parties fresh. If you have that system where you have package A, B and C, these kids have seen A, B, and C already. You have to make it more customized to the client and to the kids otherwise you'll fail. Getting a T-shirt as a prize doesn't cut it anymore. Kids want an iPod."

As big a business as bar and bat mitzvahs have become, an even larger undertaking that Mint Events recently entered is wedding planning.

"The wedding industry is more saturated than the bar and bat industry," says Florence. "There are probably 10 wedding DJs for every one bar mitzvah company."

So why did Mint Events even bother entering this crowded business? "It's a lot of fun," says Florence, who recently had his own wedding. "I know not only from doing it for a living, but doing it myself, what it takes to plan a wedding. We just want to be as diverse as possible without forgetting where we came from."

Florence isn't kidding about not forgetting his roots. Not only are kids still an important part of his business – Mint is putting on 53 events at camps this summer – but he still regularly DJs bar and bat mitzvah parties.

"I still DJ every weekend. I'm going to be 33, and I just got married, but I love it. It's still the best job you can ever have."

Invitations get your simchah off to an elegant start

By JENNA ROSMAN
Special to the CJN

Invitation design sets the tone for the party, says invitation designer Sharon Klinghoffer.

"Many times, brides come in with their colour theme in mind and they want their invitation to carry on with that. It's the first thing the guests see," says Klinghoffer, who along with her best friend Gerri Goldberg, operates Designs by Sharon.

Invitations by Designs by Sharon.

"Our goal is to not only make a beautiful product, but to make our customers feel very comfortable, happy, content and satisfied when they come here and when they leave here," she says. "There is no other place in the city that delivers customer service like we do."

Designs by Sharon, which is best known for doing customized and unique work, has incorporated colourful photographs of a bar mitzvah boy or a bat mitzvah girl into designs. Other options include creating custom-made invitations made to fit into a gift box that is often hand-delivered by clients to invitees. Silk-dried flowers, rhinestones and even pearls have been integrated into invitations.

As far as invitational style for weddings, Klinghoffer says earthy tones have become popular, along with cream tones, and colours such as muted gold, and sage green. Pink and purple tones, Klinghoffer says, are timeless.

Klinghoffer says that an outgoing trend in invitational design is layering.

"Styles change every 10 years," she says. "People want that clean look and change."

Klinghoffer says Designs by Sharon make the most striking baby cards in Toronto.

Their 3-D card features many different pop-up options, such as rubber duckies or baby shoes.

"Just like customizing a piece of beautiful jewelry, we do the same things with our invitations," she said.

Graphic designer and visual artist Heather Hennick of Partyzazz (www.partyzazz.com) specializes in special event production, including invitation design, posters and promotional material needed for events.

"I offer not just by-the-book [items]. I'm an expert of not just paper design and so on, but I can do things that other people aren't able to do," she said, "I work with unique concepts such as dye-cut [creative and unique shapes of invitations and invitational seals]. I work with different medias in terms of producing cards with original covers. It's very custom sort of work."

Hennick is able to produce invitational seals in various shapes.

"For example, if it is for a bar mitzvah, I can make a seal in the shape of a Torah," she said.

Unconventional backgrounds and colours are incorporated into Hennick's creations, through her use of graphic design. Hennick has integrated materials such as leather, plastic and wax into her cards.

An invitation by Partyzazz.

While you can choose a standard invitation out of a catalogue at Partyzazz, Hennick said it's most common for people to add their own personal touches.

"Because I'm an artist and a designer, I'm able to change the design to make it a bit different," she says.

Hennick says Jewish weddings often incorporate aspects of Judaism into the design, such as "expression, spiritual sayings and [religious] elements"

Hennick says the fundamental difference between a standard and professionally made invitation is its beauty.

"It's really a whole science of things that make it a beautiful invitation," she says. "My job is really to help the client establish what they are trying to say and if I can do that successfully and cleanly, then that's a beautiful invitation."

Hennick says that while she can have a card printed as quickly as one week, other cards require several months. She recommends that clients call her a year prior to their event.

"It's about talking about what your ideas are. People want something different. It's not about looking in a book and you're going to see it. I don't think I've ever done one invitation that was the same," she said. "Everyone is different."

For more information about invitations from Designs by Sharon, contact Sharon Klinghoffer or Gerri Goldberg at 905-881-5884.

Enjoy hands-on activities at your next party

By JEN THOMPSON
Special to The CJN

Looking for a fun activity for your next event? Need an idea that is innovative and sure to impress? Perhaps you would like to create beautiful, handmade jewelry. Or have you ever thought of running away and joining the circus? If so, Beadology (416-898-1347) and The Wonderful World of Circus (905-479-2411) are two activities that are sure to entertain you and your guests.

Sabrina Smith created Beadology four years ago, when a weekly bead club for adults with psychiatric disorders grew into a new type of art therapy program. As a result of the success of the program, there was some increased demand for Smith's talents. People were constantly asking her to come to parties and teach both children and adults the art of beadology. Smith decided that it would be a wonderful opportunity to share her love of making beads with the community.

Beadology brings the world of beads to you. Smith and her staff bring everything needed, including the skills to ensure the most organized, colourful and creative items possible. New projects are being designed all the time, and Smith says all the participants – adults and children, boys and girls – love the things they create.

The tools Smith brings include everything necessary to make beautiful beads that will last for years. A Beadology party consists of a beading lesson and a trained professional to assist and supervise. Guests have a huge selection of beads and colours to choose from. They take their projects home in decorative organza bags filled with goodies for each individual creation.

Girls love making crystal bead necklaces, beaded headbands and seed bead chokers. However, Smith says that the boys love beadology just as much as the girls.

"It's often harder to get the boys to stop working on their projects than the girls," Smith says. She is constantly amazed by their creativity. Boys love to use materials such as leather and wood to make their own creations.

Not limited to birthdays and bar and bat mitzvahs, Beadology offers numerous services for its clients. It has camp programs for children of all ages. And a beadology class is also a great idea for bridal showers, corporate events, interactive fundraisers, home jewelry parties and community centre workshops.

Since its inception, Beadology has become increasingly popular. Smith suggests booking a month in advance for your event. However, she will always try to accommodate her clients' schedules.

Another unique activity to consider for your next event is The Wonderful World of Circus. Located in Thornhill, Ont., the Wonderful World of Circus was established in 1996 by world-renowned circus performers Oleg Kantemirov and Tatiana Zoubrilina. Many of the students and performers have worked, or now work, with Moscow Circus, Cirque du Soleil, Cirque Niagara and other world famous circuses.

A party at the Wonderful World of Circus will have something to entertain everyone. The hour in the gym includes a clown show where clowns interact with kids, funny games, and activities on gym and circus equipment. A real circus show can be customized with additional performances with trained dogs or birds, a magician or an air gymnast, a professional circus juggler, or if available, an amazing blow-up clown act.

The Wonderful World of Circus offers other specialized services: field trips on which children will see magical, amazing performances they have never seen before; or workshops where students can gain first-hand experience as circus performers. Classes and camps are available throughout the year.

Use caution when buying jewelry, dealer warns

By JENNA ROSMAN
CJN Intern

The president of a venerable Toronto jewelry store says customers need to be wary of deceitful activity within the industry.

"You've really got to go to a jeweller you can trust, who has the knowledge," says Lorne Spivack, who is also a co-owner of Samuel Kleinberg Jewellers along with Samuel Kleinberg and John Fairley.

"We're finding that there is just so much misconception out there in the marketplace today, especially with appraisals," adding that it's difficult for the average consumer to distinguish between a real and counterfeit diamond.

"[A fake diamond] doesn't have the brilliance that a real diamond does. It's probably not going to have any inclusions [flaws] in it, like a real stone would," he said. "It will look too perfect."

He said the fundamental difference between a poor quality and high quality diamond is in overall beauty.

"What diamonds do is they reflect light," said Spivack. "If a diamond is cut properly, if it's in the right proportion, the light will reflect from the diamond and catch the eye."

Spivack said that the cut, clarity, colour and weight of the diamond determine its overall value, but he cautions that "if [your appraisal] is off by even half a grade, it can make a big difference on the price of the stone."

Overall beauty is the main feature of high-quality diamonds

The business, which was established in 1967, imports diamonds and gold, and sells four different brands of watches: Movado, Esquire, Bulova and Wittnauer.

He said the company has been "built on reputation," which has contributed to its longstanding success.

Spivack said there are many trends in jewelry fashion at the moment. White gold, he said, is most popular, but "in Europe, it's starting to turn into yellow again, which we'll see here in a couple of years," he said.

"We're also starting to do a lot of second engagement rings for couples who have been married 20 or 25 years. They are starting to upgrade to a larger stone."

Samuel Kleinberg Jewellers is located at 3130 Bathurst St., Suite 204. You can call the store at 416-789-7557.

Samuel Kleinberg Jewellers was established in 1967.

While trying to look your best for the many occasions that fill your calendar, your wallet has the tendency to empty at a speedy pace.

Typically, buying the best quality in dress clothing can cost a pretty penny, but with the help of Raji's Custom Tailors (416-661-6777), you'll have as many suits in your closet as bills in your wallet.

Raji's Custom Tailors, which is located at 4699 Keele St., is a complete suit operation from start to finish. Everything from designing and measuring to creating is done on the premises. Having a suit made there is a completely personalized experience – at extremely affordable prices.

Raj Singh, the owner of the business as well as a tailor by trade, deals directly with his clients on a one-to-one basis. Together with the client, he designs a look from head to toe. With up-to-date catalogues and more than 600 high-quality European fabric samples in stock, Singh can create a suit for your specified measurements and with any stylistic elements you would like to add. And since you are working directly with the person who is making your suit, any and every accommodation can be made to match your needs.

With three resident experienced tailors on hand, the suit is created quickly – under two weeks – which is possible because everything is done in-house. "Since I do everything here, I can keep prices down and offer the best-quality product for my customers," says Singh.

While prices start at around $550 for a customized suit and $650 for a tuxedo, Singh has developed a convertible technology to make sure that you get the most use out of your jacket. Since tuxedos are bought or rented on rare occasions only, Singh will attach the satin lapel to the jacket by hand. Once the occasion has passed, the lapel can be removed and voilà – what you have left is an impeccably made suit.

Possibly the youngest tailor in the city, Singh is aware of trends and modern techniques in suit making. He cites an extremely fitted European silhouette as the hottest trend of the season. Suppressed at the waist with side venting, even this look can be custom-made to fit any specific measurements.

As well as the designing and manufacturing of the suit, Singh offers consultations to help best organize your wardrobe. Among his tips, he recommends getting two pairs of pants made with one suit as pants generally wear out faster than jackets or shirts. To make for a more cohesive wardrobe, he keeps a record of everything you have purchased from him on file. And to make sure you look your best, he will help you with any last-minute pressing or adjustments that need to be made.

"I want my customers to look their sharpest," says Singh. He also offers home and office calls for clients who are too busy to come in to the store.

Another option in quality men's dressing at affordable prices is Shirts Unlimited (416-784-9845), which is located at 1930 Avenue Rd. Shirts Unlimited carries an enormous selection of men's casual and dress shirts. With such a vast selection of sizes in men's shirts from short and tall to extra-tall, there is something for every man at Shirts Unlimited.

Shirts Unlimited is owned by Hersch Freedman. The former owner of Kingsport Clothiers, Freedman has been offering one of the widest selections of men's shirts in the city for more than a year now. "Everyone knows me from my 28 years at Kingsport. It's nice to run into my old customers," he says.

"No one has the selection that we do," says Freedman. "We carry over 500 patterns, fabrics and styles." But that's not all. The store also offers a wide selection of men's accessories, including ties, cufflinks, belts and even jeans. The store also offers a selection of women's clothing, including blouses and bottoms in a variety of fabrics and styles.

With casual shirts starting as low as $35 (regularly priced at $75) the store carries every style from golf and polo to knit. These shirts are offered in every size and every fabric from silk and linen to hemp.

Perhaps the greatest thing about the store is that the stock it carries is on permanent special. The store offers the bargain of three shirts for $75 or five for $100. Dress shirts, which come in a wide array of fabrics, styles and sizes, range from $35 to $100 (regularly priced at $85 to $150). And if you still can't find what you are looking for at the store, custom-made shirts can be created in seven to 10 days. As well, the already discounted shirts can be altered at no charge.

Among the many offered colours in the store, Freedman names orange and coral as the hottest shades for summer. A fitted and striped look is the hottest silhouette of the moment. While offering styles for every occasion and customer, Shirts Unlimited moves with the times. "We don't carry that fuddy-duddy stuff," he says. "We carry the off-the-wall looks, too."

Preserve memories with a photo collage, or star in your own animation

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Over the past few decades, everyone has become more sophisticated visually – more attentive to visual detail and harder to satisfy.

This sophistication is especially obvious in kids, who are more adaptable to new media than most adults.

Daniel Krenek of 12 Pix Design (647-836-5165, www.12pix.net) makes photo collages for milestone events such as birthdays, bar and bat mitzvahs, weddings and anniversaries. He did the first of these privately, as a keepsake for his mother, when she came to visit from the Czech Republic, where Krenek was born.

Krenek recommends a minimum of 12 pictures. While they will work with fewer if you want, the price is the same as for 12.

Such a collage might feature an important motif from your life. If you're an enthusiastic bike rider, for example, it might begin with a photo of you as a tot on your first tricycle, then continue through childhood and adulthood.

Krenek does other things with photos and graphic design, such as personalized postcards. And while most of his clients are private, he's interested in corporate work.

Select 12 or more photos you want to use and choose the layout you want. Drop the photos or CD with your information with Krenek, or you can mail or e-mail them.

He will use your photos with layout selection, and design a unique 11 x 17 poster and 5 x 7 postcard. Then Krenek will e-mail you the design for your approval. You can pick up your personalized design, or he will mail it to you.

Carol Solis of You Star Legends (905-901-7777, www.youstarlegends.com) offers another visual novelty gift. While this may be of special interest for birthdays and bar or bat mitzvahs, kids aren't the only ones who would like the idea.

You Star Legends makes animated movies with a kid's face, making a child the star in the movie. It's both a memento and a way of thanking guests for coming.

Currently, Solis is working on two other movies. One, Erik and the Green Gorilla, is an anti-bullying story by Scott Graham. Another is a motivation film on setting and achieving goals.

Every guest at a simchah could have a personalized movie, or as a memento, each could receive one with the bar or bat mitzvah boy or girl. They could be given at the event, or ahead of time.

You Star Legends teams up with charities and non-profit organizations. Among the charities are Possibilities, which mentors children; Angel Hair, which provides wigs for children who have lost their hair; A Child's Voice; and Camp Quality, for kids with cancer. The company can also do product placements.

Combining experience and openness to new ideas

PR Creative Caterers offers quality food and presentation at reasonable prices.

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

You've often been advised to choose the proven caterer with many years of experience. But what about giving a break to the newcomer who may be inexperienced but is open to new ideas and ready to go the extra distance needed to build a reputation from scratch?

Well, what if you don't have to make that choice? What if you can have years of professional experience at your service together with the eagerness of a man who is establishing the reputation of a new company?

This is what Yisroel Fisch of PR Creative Caterers offers you (416-787-9889). He founded the company in February this year, but at 27, he has seven years of experience catering private and corporate functions in the Toronto area, in halls, boardrooms and homes. And he's ready to put in the time and effort it takes to build a reputation.

Fisch's people bring their own expertise to the new company. His head chef, for example, was executive sous-chef at the Sheraton. His chefs know how to relate to the clients. And his wait staff are experienced, well-paid professionals.

Fisch sets out to offer quality food and presentation at reasonable prices. He co-ordinates everything with the other professionals, such as the florists, to make sure everything matches. As a client, you have the right to expect these things from any professional.

Fisch advises booking your caterer four to five months ahead, giving him time to prepare your feast properly. He will meet with you two or three times before the event, walking you through every detail to ensure there are no surprises.

Fisch can work with you whether you have a lot of definite ideas on what you want or only a few. "Know what you want when you come in," he recommends, "but take professional advice seriously."

Fisch's menu ranges from traditional (chicken soup) to popular organic (wild rice). International stations are his specialty, with dishes as diverse as couscous cakes and butternut squash soup, as well as delicious desserts and pastas. And there's a huge choice of hot and cold hors d'oeuvres.

Fisch will go to great lengths to meet the unique requirements of your party. He once hired an ice carver to make a sushi bar of solid ice.

Ze'ev Saban of Gan Eden Catering (416-222-1230, ext. 24; www.ganeden.ca) has the same standards of integrity, service and willingness to respond to the client's ideas. But like Fisch and every other fine caterer, he brings to his work a unique, personal style.

Gan Eden Catering has been in business for 15 years. Saban was always intrigued by the idea of the Garden of Eden, or Gan Eden in Hebrew. "With good food, Eden is just a taste away," he says with a smile. "And people associate fresh fruits and garden produce with Eden."

There are plenty of these on Gan Eden's menus, along with a lot of Israeli and Moroccan flavours. Menus range from kiddush and Shabbat take-outs to full-course dinners. And the staff respect the growing trend to have food that is both delicious and healthful.

"You should be a guest at your own event," Saban says, and his staff do whatever they can to make sure your event turns out great without your feeling exhausted by the end of it. They have an on-site banquet co-ordinator who takes the pressure off you.

"A party," Saban says, "is an expression of its host. Be flexible," he advises, "but have some idea of your tastes and budget. Within any realistic budget, quality is possible, and we ensure that you get the best possible options."

How far ahead to call depends on your function, Saban says. Do you just want some trays of food? Or do you want to organize an entire hall?

"The more complex your needs, the further ahead you should contact me.

"Often," Saban continues, "clients book as far as a year in advance. A month before the event, we sit down together and do the menu."

Saban can also bring in other party professionals you need, such as musicians, florists and videographers. He stands ready to supply whatever you require in order to have a happy, stress-free event.

If he can't supply something himself, he usually knows where to refer a client who wants a specific product or service. This readiness to help brings a great deal of goodwill.

"I don't have a pastry chef, for example," he says; "but I apply professional standards in choosing those I recommend."

Saban has catered private, corporate and non-profit affairs, everything from a bris to a fundraiser. Venues range from the Regency to Baycrest Terrace.

Almost always, Saban says, his company organizes the whole hall. "This makes sense," he explains, "as every facet of the party has to be integrated with the food: florists, centrepieces, linens, lighting, sound system, photographers, etc." And he enjoys providing this diversity.

PR Creative Caterers and Gan Eden Catering are both kosher under the supervision of the Kashruth Council of Canada (COR).

Liberty Group celebrates 20th year

By JENNA ROSMAN
CJN Intern

Now in its 20th year, the Liberty Entertainment Group (www.libertygroup.com) owns some of Toronto's top banquet facilities.

The Liberty Grand, the Crystal Room, the Courthouse Chamber Lounge, the Rosewater Supper Club, and its recently opened Rosewater Room are just five of the Liberty Group's 11 venues in the heart of downtown Toronto.

It features a Renaissance revival style design, 15-foot ceilings, mahogany hardwood floors, a private elevator and an original hardwood staircase from 1867.

"All of our venues cater to weddings or bar or bat mitzvahs," said marketing manager Milka Mili. She said that while most people choose to host their event at the Liberty Grand, others opt to entertain at the Rosewater Supper Club, the Courthouse, and even the Crystal Room or C-Lounge nightclubs.

Mili describes the Crystal Room, formerly known as the Left Bank, as an elegant facility that's ideal for a special private event. The venue, located on trendy Queen Street West, has just undergone a renovation.

"There's a bunch of different chandeliers we've painted. We've painted the interior. It's very clean," she said.

Culinary Arts Catering, which caters the Toronto International Film Festival, the Molson Indy, the Toronto Jazz Festival, Benson & Hedges Gold Series - Cosmic Cruises, and the BioTech Conference, is the official catering company of the Liberty Entertainment Group.

However, each venue has its own team of in-house executive chefs.

While outside kosher catering is an option at the Liberty Grand, there is no hashgachah on its in-house catering.

But Christina Xavier, senior events manager at the Liberty Grand, said: "We understand the philosophy of not mixing meat and dairy. We never serve pork and shellfish, and we do have occasions where we will create a full vegetarian, full fish, or a fully pareve menu."

The Liberty Grand, constructed in 1926, features four ballrooms with 27-foot ceilings and can accommodate events for 150 to 3,000 people.

"It's gorgeous. It's definitely a beautiful space," says Mili. "We've put in a great effort to turn it into something that attracts people, and that people want to see."

Xavier said the Liberty Grand's speciality is its "tasting menu."

"It is multiple courses of miniature foods. For instance, we will create a complete Korean kimchi [a spicy Korean cole slaw] and it's served with a very long, either tuna or all-vegetarian, sushi roll in it, and it's eaten in a cosmo glass," she said.

Dynamite (sushi) rolls, Indonesian spring rolls, and smoked-black Alaskan cod are other examples of what can be featured on a menu.

Xavier said fish such as snapper and talapia are other popular main courses.

Desserts include individual molten lava chocolate cakes served a la mode, with a vanilla bean ice cream, homemade fudge, caramel corn, apple cobbler and candy floss covered chocolate-dipped strawberries.

"We produce 400 to 500 different types of tiny, little morsels of dessert, like white chocolate or dark chocolate miniature dipped cheesecakes that are served on lollipop sticks."

For more information about the Liberty Group, call 416-LIBERTY (542-3789) or e-mail info@libertygroup.com.

EXCEEDING EXPECTATIONS EVERYTIME

Have your modern event in an 'old' setting

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

The 20,000-square-foot building, located at 1601 Lakeshore Blvd. W. between Jameson Avenue and Parkside Drive, originally housed a canoe factory and showroom and a ballroom, when it first opened in 1922.

The building has just been converted to an event venue and banquet hall, says Mary Lou Borg, a partner in the company that has leased and renovated the vintage waterfront space. "This wonderful historic building is owned by the city."

In its heyday in the 1930s and '40s, the Palais Royale was one of the city's most popular dance venues. Some of the big name attractions in those years included Count Basie, Frank Sinatra, Louis Armstrong, Benny Goodman and Duke Ellington.

Borg notes that after the war and the construction of the Gardiner Expressway, the structure gradually fell into disrepair, although it continued to be a venue for pop and rock music concerts. (The Rolling Stones played there in 2002.)

The Estates of Sunnybrook

She says the owners are aiming to restore the building to its former glory. "We've worked closely with the historical board so that the exterior will look like it did in 1922."

The revamped building with its new gleaming wood floors and walls of glass doors boasts a 4,000-square-foot waterfront deck that can accommodate 400 people, Borg says.

She muses that with seating for up to 300 people, the deck is a picturesque and romantic setting for a wedding ceremony. "We also have a full bridal suite outfitted with a luxurious vanity. The balcony in the suite has breathtaking views of the lake. It's an ideal setting for taking pictures."

She describes the decor as "contemporary Art Deco. The neutral colour is an easy colour scheme to work with. It's very elegant."

Now in its new life as a banquet facility, the former ballroom/concert hall is already in high demand, she says. "We're booked for every weekend in June and July of 2007."

Borg points out that Palais Royale is a full catering service facility with a basic package that includes tables, chairs, linens and dishes. "We have our own kitchen. It's state of the art.

"We'll be happy to accommodate any kosher event. We've started booking kosher weddings, and we've been approached to do bar and bat mitzvahs."

She says the Palais Royale has historic significance for many people. "They have an emotional attachment to the place."

Borg encourages people who have pictures, stories or memorabilia from the old ballroom to bring them to the museum in the lower lounge area. People are welcome to call to book tours. For more information about the Palais Royale, visit the website at www.palaisroyale.ca.

The Estates of Sunnybrook (416-487-3841), offers three different vintage homes – they're located off of Bayview Avenue between Lawrence and Eglinton avenues – that have been transformed into elegant banquet facilities.

Lynne Foster, director of catering sales and marketing for Sunnybrook, explains that the three properties – Vaughan Estates, McLean House and the Coach House are all owned by Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre.

"These heritage buildings are on 42 acres of land. You can't see them from the road. They're 500 yards from Bayview, so the city noise just disappears. It's a like retreat or an oasis in the city. Our clients love the privacy of the setting."

She says the old-style homes with their vintage interiors add tremendous ambiance to the parties. "People love the beautiful surroundings of these authentic old houses – the moldings, wood panelling and fireplaces. People come and tell me that you couldn't make these today if you tried."

She notes that McLean House, built in 1929, was the first of the three houses – they were all private homes donated to the hospital – to be renovated. McLean House was a show house for the Junior League in 1982 and was subsequently turned into a party facility.

Vaughan Estates, the largest of the three homes was built in 1931, and after it was donated, it was used by the hospital for clinics until its renovation in the 1990s, Foster recounts, adding that the Coach House, the smallest of the three spaces, was renovated last year.

Vaughan Estates has an extension to accommodate two ballrooms – one on the main floor and one on the lower level. The upper-level ballroom has seating for 100 to 150 people, but a maximum of 120 with dancing, while the courtyard ballroom can accommodate 70 to 140 people, with a maximum of 110 people for dancing.

The upper-level ballroom is more formal than the courtyard, which has a patio overlooking the ravine, says Foster. "The courtyard is more relaxed and informal with a beautiful view."

As for outdoor wedding ceremonies, both ballrooms offer picturesque outdoor settings. The main-floor ballroom has The Arbour, a stone oval, in the trees while the courtyard has the stone patio.

The curving staircase leading from the upper gardens to the patio offers a dramatic entrance for brides and guests, enthuses Foster. "The patio is a perfect place for cocktails, and then people can move into the courtyard ballroom for dinner.

She stresses that both ballrooms are completely private areas with separate bars, bathrooms, entrances and reception areas.

All the Sunnybrook facilities are full-service venues with their own kitchens and fully licensed bars and permanent wait staff. "We have very experienced maitre d's on staff. They run the event for you. They are totally dedicated to your event.

"The comment we get is that we are very good at taking care of people."

McLean House, a medium size venue with a picturesque garden for outdoor wedding ceremonies, can accommodate 50 to 72 people seated in one room.

Foster points out the advantages of this setting: "The clients have the entire house to themselves. It's completely private as if you're getting married in your own home."

She suggests that one room be allocated for dancing, while other smaller rooms, like the wood-panelled library, be used as conversation areas.

McLean house can hold 125 people for a cocktail-style party with food stations for grazing, Foster notes. "It's a better set-up for mingling [than a sit-down dinner]. There's more conversation spots and there can be dancing all night."

Like McLean House, the Coach House is completely private, offering a two-level venue for a maximum of 40 people. "It has its own patio as a ceremony space."

Foster says The Estates of Sunnybrook are not just for weddings and bar and bat mitzvahs. "We're a great setting for birthday and anniversary parties, showers and corporate events."

By holding events at The Estates of Sunnybrook, one makes a contribution to the health sciences, she says. "All the profits go right into the hospital's research budget. It's a nice added bonus. Your event budget is going for a good cause."

PARTY PLANNER

Without entertainment your party will be a drag

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

In planning the entertainment for your simchah, there are a lot of factors to take into account. Depending on the event, they may range from halachic considerations to venue size to the kind of lighting you choose.

You, the client, need to make the final decision on every aspect of the party you're putting on. But to make all these decisions, says Adam Swaye of Swaye Entertainment (416-545-0741; www.adamswaye.com), you need the advice of professionals who will tell you what works, and where.

Swaye Entertainment is a relatively new company. However, Swaye has performed for over 20 years, and represented performers for over 10. He has appeared before every audience from kids to senior executives, and at all kinds of venues, including casinos.

He still performs as a magician, though he books other people too: DJs, henna artists, caricaturists, airbrushers, psychics, look-alikes, singers and musicians. He also offers inflatable games and casino games. His other company, Swaye Talent Management, represents actors and actresses.

"I place high value on maintaining my reputation as a professional," Swaye says. He works closely with meeting and event planners. While his main purpose is to supply entertainment, the benefit of his advice and expertise goes with it, because the client needs to know what works best in a given situation.

Swaye adds that a true professional, while being as diplomatic as possible, will also tell you if something you want won't work. So listen carefully to the professionals you hire.

"Aside from help in the logistics of your event," Swaye points out, "the main thing they have to offer is advice." This includes working within your budget, to have the best possible choices in your price range.

Swaye got into entertainment booking because when he worked as a magician, he was too busy to take all the clients who wanted to hire him. He therefore started to refer them to other magicians, then went on to hire other types of entertainer, because his clients were looking for them.

Swaye has been around long enough to see many changes in the party industry. He knows who's new and who's old. And what's more important, he knows who's good.

Professionals in any industry often advise you to hire experienced people still in business because they've stood the test of time. On the other hand, the newcomer eager to win new clients will bend over backwards to satisfy you. Swaye offers experience along with the fresh approach of a newcomer.

Adam Swaye can be a magician and can hire other talent, centre and left. Janice O'Bright, right, of Party Extras specializes in cutting-edge ideas and the latest trends.

But the party entertainment industry is huge, as you will soon find out when you set out to organize an event. The question is not only: "Where can I find a magician, a caricaturist, etc.?" It's: "From all those available, how do I choose the one who's best for my party?"

Another person you might ask is Janice O'Bright of Party Extras (905-707-9919; www.partyextras.biz; e-mail info@partyextras.biz). Party Extras is all about knowing the answers to your questions on how to choose.

"I'm an entertainment broker," O'Bright says. "Say you want a tattoo artist, a candy table, a caricaturist and other artists for your party: I put them together for you."

As an entertainment broker, she's a kind of one-stop shop for you. She does corporate as well as private work, and entertains people of all ages.

O'Bright has a contract with Maple Leaf Sports & Entertainment. For the second year in a row, she also has a contract with the Blue Jays, Junior Jays Saturdays, and with caricaturists, face painters and tattoo artists. And her April Pizzazz program for the TTC, with caricaturists in buses and subway stations, was a huge success.

For a bar or bat mitzvah, Party Extras offers guitar pick jewelry, and vintage bottle cap jewelry is also popular. It has incredible mentalists and magicians – and the best airbrush team in Toronto.

Party Extras specializes in cutting-edge ideas and the latest trends in party merchandise. O'Bright takes the traditional party activities, and brings them into the 21st century.

The candy tables are spectacular. The company customizes candy centrepieces as part of the candy table. If a party client needs novelty foods, they provide it.

Everything is individualized: no two clients have exactly the same thing. And this respect for the individual client has been a key factor in building a regular clientele. In some families, O'Bright is now doing the bar mitzvah for the third kid.

Reputation counts for everything, O'Bright says. As a broker, she works with people who provide consistently good service.

"My aim," she says, "is to marry honesty and dependability with vibrancy and flair."

She also marries quality with affordability.

"By taking entertainment to a higher level," says O'Bright, "I not only provide something better for each of my present clients. I raise expectations and thus raise the standard, which is good for everyone."

And for O'Bright, there's more to her work than just working. "I'm ambitious," she says. "My business is a passion with me, involving head, heart and energy."

Timeless looks for your little ones

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

Somewhere between the swimming and the sandcastle making, this summer will be full of times when your child needs to look his or her best.

There is no telling how many places you might visit on a seemingly hopeless quest to find an outfit that best suits your child. To help narrow down your search, here are two of the finest locations for children's clothing in the city.

Bon Lieu (www.bonlieu.com, 416- 963-4322), which is located at 890 Yonge St., offers an extensive selection of high-end children's clothing at affordable prices. Carrying such quality lines as Jean Bourget, Miss Sixty and Energie, Bon Lieu is stocked to the brim with everything from bathing suits to snow-suits for infants to 18-year-olds. "We are a head to toe shop", says Cerissa Abbott, the store's co-owner.

For nearly 20 years ago, Bon Lieu has been at the forefront of children's fashion in Toronto. Travelling around the world to scout lines to carry in the store, Abbot carefully picks the very best. A firm believer in European craftsmanship, Abbott carries mostly the fashions from these countries. "Europeans are extremely experienced in making children's clothing," she says. "They are smartly made and therefore fit smartly."

By now you must be dreaming up the high prices at Bon Lieu, but don't be deceived. Although Bon Lieu carries higher-end clothing, there is something at the store for everyone there. With classic T-shirts starting at under $20, there are plenty of bargains to be had.

The clothing carried by Bon Lieu is durable. "Each child can get at least two years' usage out of our clothing," says Abbott.

Because of the superb quality, the clothing is often passed down between siblings. What's more, with the right jacket or skirt, so many of the items can be transformed from casual to dressy and vice versa. So, initially spending more on the item really can save you big bucks in the end. "Buy less, buy the best," says Abbott.

With all the beautiful clothing in stock, Abbott cites luxury as a rising trend in children's wear. Leather jackets and heavily detailed jeans (with adjustability for growth of course) are among the hottest items. Bright colours such as lime green and turquoise are making a big splash for summer.

Bon Lieu's biggest fans are the children themselves. "I have six-year-old boys begging their mothers to come back," says Abbot. "Kids fall in love with what they own." With the length of time they'll be wearing clothing from Bon Lieu, it's a good thing.

Another place to find gorgeous European clothing for your children is Floriane (416-920-6367), which is located at 38 Avenue Rd. Exclusively carrying the French line that gives the boutique its name, the store is full of classic looks for boys and girls aged to 12. For 30 years, the label has been making its name in Europe as a celebrated standard of quality clothing. The Toronto boutique has been open since 1999.

While moving with trends, Floriane remains a standard in impeccably made clothing for children. Dressed in Floriane, your child will never look like a fashion victim. The looks are always refined, sophisticated and beautifully designed.

Susie Lawson, the boutique's manager, cites sundresses and embroidered sweater sets among the sweetest looks for girls. Among the most popular looks for boys are casual items from the Peter Rabbit line.

The in-store service is excellent, and home deliveries can be arranged. Alterations can be made if necessary.

"We always put the customer's needs first," says Lawson.

In-house kosher catering taking off

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

At one time, the thought of kosher catering was just that, a thought. Most wedding venues, save for the Inn On The Park, didn't have a kosher kitchen, so people either spent thousands of dollars on an outside caterer, or special ordered a few kosher meals. Now, kosher kitchens are popping up everywhere, even at the once-famous theatre, the Eglinton Grand (416-485-5900).

"Right now, if somebody has to bring in outside kosher caterers, it's much more costly than what it will be if someone has an in-house kosher kitchen," says Dino Lucchetto, the Eglinton Grand's sales and marketing manager, explaining why the venue implemented kosher catering. "You shouldn't have to spend those costs to cater an event."

One reason why in-house kosher catering never took off was because there wasn't a lot of meal choice. Now, a venue can prepare the same dishes they have on their non-kosher menu.

"The kosher menu will complement the one we already have," says Lucchetto. "There are different things you can serve, like sea bass as a main entrée – that's pretty popular right now. We have a very large kosher menu to choose from."

Although the kosher menu is set, the actual kitchen isn't ready yet. Lucchetto expects the facilities to be completed sometime this summer.

Once the kitchen is open for business, he can expect to have a lot of new clients banging down his door. At least that's what happened at the Copper Creek Golf Club (905-893-3370) when they installed their kosher kitchen two years ago.

"We had new business right away," says Douglas Collier, director of food and beverage operations and the Copper Creek Golf Club. "Having a kosher event is becoming more and more important. I think people are starting to lean towards more traditional values. Also, in the past people didn't have avenues to seek out kosher catering. Those who had the values felt that they didn't have the options. Now the options are there and becoming more and more so."

Like the Eglinton Grand, Copper Creek can provide an array of tasty meals, but Collier says that they provide a "new spin on kosher."

"Our chef is phenomenal. He's Italian, and he brings a very non-traditional approach to kosher catering. This industry is like the restaurant business – the new guy on the block is good for the first six months, until the next thing comes along. You really have to work hard to bring new ideas."

Some of these non-traditional meals include curry, sushi and soup stations and having pasta as an appetizer as opposed to a salad. They'll also prepare more regular meals like salmon or fish, but, says Collier, beef Wellington is a popular choice.

Even though party goers can now choose pretty much any food they want, it's still a challenge to cater kosher in-house.

"When you're doing new renovations there are challenges, of course," says Lucchetto. "To keep things kosher, a certain cleaner has to be used, and the mashgiach has to be present."

Collier says,"Our costs are a little bit more expensive. In order to keep costs down and pricing reasonable, you need to be smart in the way you prepare. You have to be careful. We do a lot more of the prep ourselves.

"Chicken, for example – we buy whole chickens and we break everything down ourselves because that way I can achieve almost the same pricing as I would a non-kosher chicken."

The benefits of having a kosher kitchen obviously outweigh the challenges – if they didn't, venues wouldn't offer the service. With so much choice for food, people can concentrate on other aspects of a venue than the food when deciding where to host an event.

While the Eglinton Grand and Copper Creek are both full-service venues, they offer very different things in terms of décor. The former used to be an old theatre, and still maintains the Art Deco finishing, while the latter's well-groomed lawns make for the perfect place to take wedding photos.

"There's usually an outdoor component for most events, which is a main attraction here," says Collier. "Whether it be the gazebo or some cocktails on the patio. The lower terrace has a stunning view – it overlooks the ninth and tenth holes."

Besides looking great, both venues have spacious rooms that hold a large number of guests.

"We have a 600-seat ballroom and we have a smaller room downstairs that seats 130 with dinner and dancing capabilities," says Collier. "Our gazebo can host outdoor wedding ceremonies with up to 500 guests."

Lucchetto says the Eglinton Grand can hold from 300 to 500 people depending on if there's dancing or not, but that the guest list for many of their events is much smaller, he adds.

"I noticed that the actual events have gotten smaller. Before you'd have a lot of events with 300 people. Now, it's a lot more intimate. Just personal friends and family members."

Even though fewer people are attending functions, both the Eglinton Grand and Copper Creek are booked solid.

Collier says his venue puts on about three weddings a weekend between May and October.

Lucchetto hopes that once his kosher kitchen is ready, business will be even busier. "We're hoping business will boom. People will see that it's more convenient to come into a venue that has an actual caterer, than hiring someone from outside," he says.

NOT QUITE SEEING EYE TO EYE: Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, left, visited Jordan's King Abdullah II in Amman last week to present his plan for unilateral withdrawal from parts of the West Bank if there are no peace talks with the Palestinians. Olmert called Jordan "a true partner for bringing peace to the region." For his part, King Abdullah urged Olmert to negotiate with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. "A negotiated agreement that leads to a viable and contiguous independent Palestinian state, on Palestinian territory, will help to establish a just, comprehensive Middle East peace that provides security and stability to every Arab and Israeli, man, woman and child," the king said. [RNS/Reuters photo]

Academic boycott of Israel cancelled

By TALYA HALKIN
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — A motion to boycott Israeli academics, approved two weeks ago by the National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education (NATFHE), Britain's largest academic trade union, was cancelled on Sunday afternoon.

Several factors in the boycott's cancellation were cited, foremost among them international pressure from academic organizations. Another influence was the threat of legal proceedings by union members who claimed the boycott would hurt their ability to do research.

The union's official statement had declared that the "conference notes [the] continuing Israeli apartheid policies, including [the] construction of the exclusion wall, and discriminatory educational practices."

A similar boycott against Bar-Ilan and Haifa universities was also cancelled last year due to international pressure.

Yosef Yeshurun, rector (dean) of Bar-Ilan University and head of the International Advisory Board (IAB) for Academic Freedom, praised the decision. "Academic boycotts hurt the essence of academia," he said.

The boycott had provoked a wave of condemnations from Israeli and British officials and from senior academics and universities in Israel and abroad.

"Around the world this proposal has been rejected as an act of blatant discrimination," said Israel's ambassador to the United Kingdom, Zvi Hefetz. "As a means of promoting dialogue and coexistence in the Middle East, an academic boycott of Israel is counterproductive in the extreme."

The call to consider a boycott of Israeli academics was passed with 106 votes in favour, 71 votes against and 21 abstentions.

"By pursuing such a policy, NATFHE will isolate its members and their students rather than isolating Israeli academics, who are [in] the forefront of international co-operation on academic study and research, including with Palestinian universities and institutions elsewhere in the Arab world," Hefetz added.

The British Foreign and Commonwealth Office Minister Lord Triesman also expressed regret at the boycott vote.

Losing the propaganda war

Analysis

By ANSHEL PFEFFER
Jerusalem Post

Brig.-Gen. Miri Regev can sum up her first year as an IDF spokesperson with great satisfaction: her unit succeeded in its two main missions.

The pullback from the Jewish settlements in Gaza and parts of the West Bank were packaged and presented to the Israeli public, with the help of a willing media, as a heartwarming demonstration of the army as a unifying force in Israeli society, under the brilliant slogan of "determination and sensitivity."

Miri Regev

Regev's other success was in selling her boss, chief of general staff Lt.-Gen. Dan Halutz, as the nation's most responsible person. She helped build Halutz's image as the wise and resourceful "Mr. Security" who nobly shepherded novice Defence Minister Amir Peretz through the pitfalls of his new and frightening job.

Both successes were achieved on the home field, in the Israeli media, a statement not intended to belittle the achievement, because Regev's predecessor, Ruth Yaron, seldom

CANADA

J'lem 'Blunder' Fixed

MONTREAL — Quebec's Ministry of International Relations quickly changed information on its website after La Presse reported June 2 that the department had made "the diplomatic blunder" of citing Jerusalem as Israel's capital. Ministry spokesperson Jean Fortin told the paper that it was a "silly and unfortunate error," adding that Quebec, which has "always conformed to Canadian policy, does not want to distinguish itself." The website now states: "Israel has declared Jerusalem to be its capital. However, the final status of Jerusalem has yet to be resolved and Canada, like most other countries, maintains its embassy in Tel Aviv."

$20M Gift to Hospital

VANCOUVER — Noted Jewish philanthropists Gordon and Leslie Diamond last week announced a $20-million donation to Vancouver General Hospital. A new 11-storey centre now being built at the hospital will be named after the couple. They cited Jewish values as their reason for the donation, which will fund programs and equipment.

WORLD

More Liberal Mikvahs

BOSTON — The number of non-Orthodox Jewish ritual baths in North America is growing. Most of the 20 or so mikvahs are less than five years old, said organizers of Reclaiming Mikveh, a three-day conference of clergy and educators last week in Newton, Mass., sponsored by the Union for Reform Judaism. Almost all the mikvahs are also linked with Reform or Conservative shuls, which are often blocked from using Orthodox mikvahs.

Chief Rabbi Attacked

ZAGREB — Croatia's chief rabbi, Eliezer Aloni, was attacked May 3 on a Zagreb street. Men yelling "Jews out," in German, pushed him to the ground, Ha'aretz reported.

El Al Plot Foiled

ZURICH — Swiss authorities said they're holding seven suspects in a plot to attack an El Al plane. They announced the arrests June 8, saying the suspects were of African origin and are believed to have planned an attack on the Israeli airline in Switzerland. Swiss and French intelligence reportedly foiled a plot by Arab immigrants to down an El Al jet over Geneva in December.

Alleged Nazi Guards Facing Trial

ST. CATHARINES — The trial of two alleged Nazi concentration camp guards got under way last week with testimony of the horrors of life in a Nazi concentration camp.

Josef Furman, 85, of Edmonton, and Jura Skomatchuk, 83, of St. Catharines, are facing allegations they obtained citizenship by lying about their wartime service in Nazi units. A finding against them could lead to the removal of their citizenship and deportation. Both cases were launched more than two years ago.

Historian Johannes Tuchel told the court his research suggested Skomatchuk was trained as an armed guard at the Trawniki camp before serving at several concentration camps.

Former prisoner Jack Terry described the inhuman conditions of living in captivity, including details from some of the places where the two accused allegedly worked, Canadian Press reported. Guards were known for their "unsurpassed brutality," he testified. "They would curse us, kick us. Rifle butts were the usual way of dealing with us."

The Crown alleges Furman took part in the liquidation of the Warsaw and Bialystok ghettos in Poland in 1943. He was later transferred to the Flossenburg concentration camp.

Skomatchuk allegedly served as a Trawniki guard when 40,000 Jewish inmates of the labour camps at Poniatowa, Majdanek and Trawniki were executed.

Support Wanes

WASHINGTON — Pro-Palestinian sentiment in Europe is waning, says Stan Greenberg, one-time pollster for former U.S. president Bill Clinton. Greenberg, who recently polled Europeans on behalf of the Israel Project, told the Jerusalem Post the results showed a "dramatic" shift away from previously widespread pro-Palestinian sympathy, especially in France. He said many Europeans used to see the Palestinians as struggling against a "colonial" Israel, but now it's "the Palestinians who may be the extremists, or who are allied with extremists who threaten Europe's own society."

Divestment Denounced

BOSTON — A Presbyterian minister in Boston has denounced the Presbyterian Church USA's resolution to divest from firms that do business with Israel. Speaking at the Jewish Community Relations Council of Greater Boston's annual meeting May 31, Rev. Hurmon Hamilton, of Roxbury Presbyterian Church and president of the Greater Boston Interfaith Organization, said he would work within the church and with interfaith allies to rescind the national church's stance. The Presbyterian Church USA is meeting later this month in Birmingham, Ala., to revisit the issue.

Associated mom grills MPP on school funding

By JENNA ROSMAN
CJN Intern

Gila Martow, a Thornhill mother with three kids in Jewish day schools, became so angry about what she considers Ontario's discriminatory policy on funding faith-based education that she invited her local MPP on a school tour to press home her point.

Along with Associated Hebrew Schools' senior principal Sandy Rabinowitz and incoming vice-president Claire Glowinsky, Martow met Thornhill Liberal MPP Mario Racco May 26 at Associated's Kamin Education Centre in Thornhill, where they toured the campus and discussed the funding issue.

"They are not going to write us a cheque tomorrow," Martow told The CJN in an interview before the meeting. "[The aim of the tour is] to keep the pressure up. That's what I'm hoping to accomplish. Eventually, maybe we'll get some funding."

Martow – a member of Parents For Equality in Education Funding (PEEF), a multi-faith coalition of parents with children in non-Catholic faith-based schools – pays about $10,000 a year in tuition for each of her two youngest children, who are at Associated. She also has another child at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, where tuition is about $15,000, and another who attends the University of Western Ontario.

She said it's unfair that the province funds Catholic schools, but not those of any other faith.

"We are not legally obligated to fund [Catholic schools] past Grade 9, based on the 1867 Confederation agreement. We are not legally obligated to fund their sports programs, confirmations, parking lots [or bus transportation]," Martow told Racco.

"People at this school would just be happy if they got the cost of busing. We would be happy with that, because we don't get any funding, let alone busing. If you could at least pay for our busing and our arts programs, it's really a start."

On May 5, Premier Dalton McGuinty announced a $4-million Arts Education Partnership, a program that promises to match, dollar-for-dollar, funds raised privately for arts education in public and Catholic schools.

During his tour, she handed him a package that included two tongue-in-cheek application forms for the new arts program – one for each of her children – as well as a bank statement showing her property tax and tuition payments.

"I'd be happy to take your application, but I think you know the answer," Racco said as he accepted the file.

Referring to the McGuinty government's 2003 decision to repeal the tuition tax credit for parents with children in faith-based schools, Racco told The CJN that while Martow made some "decent arguments" during his visit, the Liberal government "rightfully or wrongly" has "decided to support what is considered to be the public school system, based on the 1867 Confederation agreement."

Glowinsky stressed that neither she nor Martow was speaking on behalf of Associated, but she said "many of the school's parents go through tough personal sacrifices in order to be able to send their children to [Jewish day schools]."

She said Associated's enrolment has decreased since the McGuinty government repealed the Equality in Education Tax Credit.

"The fees have crossed a certain point where it's not manageable for a family. The sacrifice has become too enormous for a family of two or three children. They'll then have to move into the public system, which is a wonderful thing, but the community deserves the choice," Glowinsky said. "But no child is turned away [by the school]."

About 43 per cent of Associated's 1,700 students receive financial assistance for tuition, said Chuck English, Associated's marketing co-ordinator.

But Martow said even people like her and her husband, who are both doctors, are financially strained by tuition.

"Who can afford $10,000 a year per child?" she asked, adding that some parents earn too much to qualify for assistance, "but it's not enough to really afford it. Those are the people who are really losing out."

Coexistence still quite delicate

Part 5 of the highlights from the International Conference of Jewish Newspaper Editors May 7 to 11 in Israel.

Early in the morning on the next-to-last day of the conference, the group of editors left the golden streets of Jerusalem and headed north through the densely populated low-lying plain of central Israel to the lush green hills of the Galilee.

Our destination was Nazareth, the largest Arab community in Israel outside Jerusalem. Our objective was to peer into the world of Jewish Arab co-existence by visiting with the principals of a joint high-tech venture and with Arab journalists.

New Generation Technology (NGT) is a small company based in Nazareth whose chief executive officer, Sharon Dvir, is Jewish and whose vice-president, Nasri Said, is Arab. They and the company's seven-member board of directors, four of whom are Arab, are described as a high-tech incubator. They bring together expertise in broadly inter-related disciplines such as science, business and high-tech and try to find startup businesses to nurture and in which to invest.

Two of their current projects involve companies producing a dental fluoride treatment and specialized infant formula products.

Succeeding in business is NGT's main objective. The principals understand that any commercial success of the company might help to close, if only a little bit, the economic gap between Arab Israelis, who comprise nearly 20 per cent of Israel's population, and the majority Jewish Israelis. In addition, they are also keenly aware of the important positive symbolism of the example inherent in the unique joint nature of their company's efforts.

The mature business and social entrepreneurs of NGT are products of the intense, hard-scrabble societies from which they sprang. They are not naive. But nor are they so cynical as to have abandoned all belief in the possibility that they can help bring about change for the better in their shared homeland and make some money in the process.

A decidedly different sensibility and ensuing sense of possibility, however, on the subject of sharing this embattled homeland permeated our meeting with the two Arab journalists, whom we met.

Haneen Zoubi is the general director of the Ilam Center, a media centre for Arab Palestinians in Israel. In her mid-30s, she was a firebrand of unceasing, heated complaints of disaffection with and alienation from the Jewish state.

She would not be reconciled under any circumstances to the very essence of the Zionist enterprise, namely to build a state for Jews.

"Israel cannot be Jewish and democratic at the same time. We identify ourselves with the 1.2 million Palestinians of Israel. We would not move away from Israel. This is our homeland. We consider ourselves indigenous peoples."

To drive the point home more precisely, Zoubi used a phrase whose meaning no one could mistake. "The government's program to develop the Galilee and the Negev is really the Judaization of the land."

"We want equality but at the same time we want to maintain our Arab culture. It is not treason to say this," Zoubi pleaded.

"I recognize Israel; I simply demand equality. I want real political influence. But I define myself as Palestinian because this is what I am. I support the Palestinian struggle. You cannot say Israel is a democracy simply because it provides Arabs the right to vote."

Adeeb Alwan, a freelance journalist who has worked in Saudi Arabia and for the BBC in London, is more than twice Zoubi's age. However, the opportunity to speak to a group of Jewish journalists from the foreign media must have excited him for he spoke with equal vigour to that of his younger colleague, echoing her litany of complaints concerning Israel's flawed democracy.

When asked at one point whether they could cite anything positive about living in Israel, neither journalist could find the words.

Zoubi and Alwan spoke insistently and at great length, listing item after item of alleged Israeli failures toward its Arab minority. But none among the group challenged them until Zoubi expressed her approval for military actions against Israelis who live beyond the Green Line, the pre-Six Day War borders. Then emotions erupted among the group of editors.

The contrast between the two "coexistence" programs was as distressing as it was eye-opening. For we were told that Zoubi and Alwan are considered moderates in the realm of Arab Israeli (Palestinian) journalists.

No one, least of all any Israelis, will ever assert that Israeli society is flawless. There are a number of social, economic, cultural and political gaps including foremost perhaps the gap between Jewish and Arab Israelis, that need to be bridged. But if "moderates" reject the Jewish dream of attempting to secure a Jewish majority for the State of Israel, what are the realistic chances for a quiet, peaceful reconciliation between Jewish and Arab Israelis, let alone between Israelis and Palestinians?

CUPE faces more fire for anti-Israel resolutions

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

One of the oldest social service agencies to unionize in Ontario has pulled out of CUPE Ontario over a resolution that slams Israel and accuses it of practicing "apartheid."

Local 265, which represents about 100 workers at the Jewish Family and Child Service in Toronto, notified CUPE Ontario president Sid Ryan it is withdrawing from the regional labour association because of the "one-sided and insensitive" resolution.

The resolution, passed unanimously by 896 delegates at the union's recent convention, calls for boycotts and divestment from Israel unless Israel recognizes the Palestinian right to self determination. It also condemns Israel's security barrier as an "apartheid wall."

In a letter to Ryan, local president Teena Grund noted that members of local 265 were "pioneer members of both CUPE National and the Ontario division. Maintaining a sense of pluralism and inclusiveness seemed always to be important pillars of belief within the labour movement. From our perspective, these beliefs have now been indelibly stained. We will not allow ourselves to belong to an organization so intent in both excluding us and making us feel unwelcome."

Grund urges CUPE Ontario's leadership to rescind the resolution.

Criticism of the CUPE Ontario resolution was widespread. Columnists and editorial writers blasted the union for dabbling in foreign policy instead of sticking to labour issues, for focusing on Israel while ignoring human rights violators around the world, and for disregarding steps Israel has taken for peace.

In Winnipeg, New Democrat MP Pat Martin stated, "contrary to CUPE Ontario's resolution calling for economic sanctions and boycotts against Israel, I am proud that my union, the United Brotherhood of Carpenters, has significant investments in Israel through its benefit and investment plans. I will certainly be encouraging our leadership to ignore any appeal to join this misguided activism.

"Israel is a modern and progressive multi-party democracy with a free and independent trade union movement, freedom of speech and religion, and a profound and frequently tested commitment to human rights. If anything, the State of Israel deserves the support of the international labour movement for fostering and encouraging these values in spite of overwhelming adversity and relentless attack."

In a column in the Toronto Star, Buzz Hargrove, president of the Canadian Auto Workers, wrote, "The Canadian labour movement and the left could play an important role in supporting a peaceful resolution to the Middle East conflict. To do this, however, we must get past simple rhetoric – like the claim that Israel is equivalent to the former South African apartheid regime."

Hargrove called for an end to finger pointing and for more constructive advocacy of dialogue in the region.

Some CUPE members were scathing in their denunciations of Ryan. Carolyn Roberts, president of CUPE National local 21237, which represents Jewish Vocational Service workers in Toronto, said Ryan "has become an embarrassment to the dignity, equality, respect and goodwill associated with the CUPE name."

Roberts accused Ryan of ignoring union protocol by staging the vote without proper notification and on the Jewish Sabbath, when observant Jews would not be present.

"Mr. Ryan is clearly not in alignment with an agenda that genuinely seeks peace, but rather, something quite the contrary. He is completely ignorant of the fact his actions are not only undermining Middle East peace, but solidarity and the whole labour movement right here at home by undermining our efforts to serve our members in our locals."

CUPE Ontario member Cindy Himelstein wrote to Ryan to say that passage of the resolution came as "a complete shock to me."

An employee of the Children's Aid Society of Toronto, Himelstein said the resolution was passed on the Sabbath, when she could not attend. "This issue was not even discussed at my local union membership meetings before the convention so that all CUPE members could be involved.

"As a paid member of CUPE, I am outraged to know that part of my union dues is going to be used for this one-sided campaign of 'boycott, divestment and sanctions.' Nothing positive will be accomplished by these sanctions."

Simon Kalkstein, a 30-year union veteran and past president of local 265, said "there has been a fair bit of outrage and disappointment" at the resolution. "It is certainly a very divisive issue. It was presented as unanimous, but now that we're faced with it, there are a lot of members of CUPE – many Jewish, but many gentiles who are fair-minded – who feel it's one-sided."

Canadian Friends of Peace Now called the resolution "simplistic, one-sided and ill-timed approach to the conflict.

"We consider [Ryan's] embrace of the strategy of 'boycott, divestment and sanctions' to punish Israel for its occupation of Palestinian territory to be both morally obtuse and divorced from reality. The boycott, and CUPE Ontario's embrace of it, suggests that only Israel is at fault for the ongoing conflict between the Jewish state and the Palestinians."

Daniel Orner, a graduate student at York University and a member of CUPE Ontario local 3903, called the resolution "ridiculous."

He said he was unaware in advance the vote was coming up, adding "It never entered my mind that a union which is supposed to deal with [labour] issues would discuss Middle Eastern politics."

Orner's local, however, which represents faculty, teaching assistants and graduate assistants at York, said it was one of the locals to bring the resolution to the CUPE convention. In a posting on its website, local 3093 stated the resolution was debated and approved "by the general membership at one of our monthly membership meetings." It calls on visitors to the site to sign an online petition supporting "CUPE Ontario's courageous position."

"Our local has a long history of doing international solidarity work. This resolution was among several resolutions that 3903 submitted on international solidarity," the Web posting states. "Others included calling for the removal of Canadian troops from Afghanistan and Haiti."

Good police work netted terror suspects: Kwinter

By JESSICA FREIMAN
CJN Intern

Although his talk had been scheduled far in advance, the recent arrest of 17 terror suspects gave a timely urgency to a speech last week by Monte Kwinter, Ontario's minister of community safety and correctional services, about preventing emergencies in the province.

Kwinter, the MPP for York Centre, spoke at a fundraiser for Boys Town Jerusalem, a technological school for disadvantaged children in Israel.

He credited the recent arrests in southern Ontario to good policing.

"All policing is intelligence, whether it's terrorism or organized crime. It has to be intelligence," he said.

"It's not just catching them, but when the police do arrest them, they have to be fairly certain that they have evidence and can convince a judge that the suspects have done something. That's why it takes so long."

The law enforcement body responsible for the Ontario arrests is called INSET – the Integrated National Security Enforcement Team – which is headed by the RCMP but includes officers from the OPP's anti-terrorist unit, as well as CSIS, border police, and all major police forces in Ontario.

Among his other varied duties, Kwinter is responsible for all policing in Ontario, including the Ontario Provincial Police.

This month's terror arrests have been in the works for two years, and police have monitored e-mails and used wiretaps, surveillance cameras and undercover agents.

"Police continue their surveillance as long as they can to build their case and make sure everything is absolutely documented," he said. The investigators wait until the last minute and until they are of the opinion a suspect or suspects would pose an immediate danger if they did not intervene.

The trigger for the recent arrests, Kwinter said, was the delivery of what the terror suspects believed to be ammonium nitrate, a compound used by farmers but capable of significant destruction if used as an explosive.

The suspects are now being held in Milton at the Maplehurst Correctional Complex. "It's quite interesting, because the justice of the peace said that the suspects are to have no contact with one another. What's happened is that they are now complaining that it's against their religion and want to pray together. Each one has been given a Qur'an, and the option of special dietary meals."

The type of surveillance activity that led to the arrests is going on all the time, Kwinter said.

"I knew that this particular event was in the works months ago. I didn't get a lot of details. I knew it was ongoing. I was surprised that so many people were surprised. This is a global problem. Nobody in the world is safe from the Al Qaeda doctrine," he added.

"When I talk to the people who report to me, it's not a matter of if, it's a matter of when. [Al Qaeda leader Osama] Bin Laden wants people who are fighting in Afghanistan to pay for it."

Though it may be difficult for Canadians to think of terror as a reality, he said, "who would have ever thought that 9/11 could have ever happened? It's out of science fiction."

After Kwinter's talk, an audience member asked him whether the Ontario terror suspects are a real threat or just young amateurs who need not be taken seriously.

The minister responded with an anecdote about a mission he led to Israel with 30 police chiefs to learn about how to deal with terror from Israeli experts.

"We were shown videos from Arabic-language television with parents saying that the greatest thing that could happen to their child is that he should die as a suicide bomber," Kwinter recalled.

"These kids are indoctrinated. Other than one man who is 43, all the other arrested suspects are young ideologues. Some are younger than 18. They are people who have been convinced that their role in life is to create havoc. A young person of 18 is very capable of killing," he said.

School funding upsets parent

As he toured the building, Racco said that there "has always been discussion about this issue, for many, many years. My party has also thought about it, and there will be more thought given, more discussion taking place in the future."

Martow noted that in 1999 and again in 2005, the United Nations ruled Ontario to be in violation of international human rights law because of its educational funding system, and she said that on May 12, she submitted a PEEF petition to Racco with about 1,000 signatures in support of equal funding for faith-based schools

Racco told her he read the petition into the record in the legislature on May 15, but Martow noted that he omitted the phrase, "Whereas Ontario is the only western democracy that fully funds faith-based schools of one religion to the total exclusion of all other religions."

Violent death was vain nihilist's final glory

The questions that surfaced about the final moments last week of the life of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi are irrelevant. Whether the leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq died immediately under the concrete rubble of his bombed hideaway, or some moments afterward while lying on a medic's stretcher, or, as an Iraqi "witness" has claimed, after a beating administered by unnamed American soldiers, matters only for the sake of the accuracy of the historical record. The entry that now matters most beside his name is the adjective "dead."

Not surprisingly, some Hamas officials in the Palestinian Authority mourned the news of Zarqawi's death. "We are dead sure that assassination of any of the people [like Zarqawi] who are resisting will not... end the resistance," PA Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar said.

But to refer to Zarqawi's penchant for sadistic slaughter as a form of resistance is to buff too shiny a gloss on the term "resistance." That so many journalists dignified his vicious brutality as a campaign of "resistance" was always puzzling. For he aimed very few of his attacks at the "occupiers" themselves.

For more than three years, Zarqawi planned and executed horrific, at times ghoulishly sadistic, acts of violence against a great many individuals the vast majority of whom were innocent of the slightest taint of complicity in or responsibility for the Allied presence in Iraq. His was nihilistic, seemingly pleasurable murder.

His targets were generally civilian foreigners whom he tortured and then murdered – some as we know, by beheading. He also targeted members of the diplomatic corps, as well as ordinary Iraqis at their places of worship, at the marketplace or merely standing, unluckily, at the side of the road. He was particularly frenzied in targeting Iraqi Shiites, hoping thereby to incite and inspire sectarian bloodshed. Not to be forgotten was his strike outside of occupied Iraq, in Amman, Jordan. A triple suicide bombing there resulted in the slaughter of some 60 people.

No doubt, Zarqawi will soon be replaced in Al Qaeda's video-adoring pantheon of anti-occupation, resistance-fighting leaders. Indeed, a statement under the alleged authority of Osama bin Laden was released on the weekend to that very effect. And more innocent lives, alas, will soon be cut short. For that is the Al Qaeda way.

It is ironic, but not amusing, that Zarqawi's end may have come because of his boastful, bloated vanity. Western security officials have suggested that the video he recently released, in which he appeared unmasked and taunting, provided the final clues to his whereabouts. That his own vanity was ultimately Zarqawi's undoing is not surprising. For, at its core, the terrorist's fanatic bloodlust is a callow, cruel conceit of close-minded pretension.

CUPE boycott of Israel

With the passage of a resolution calling for a boycott of Israel, Sid Ryan, the president of the Canadian Union of Public Employees' Ontario branch, has decided that adding achieving peace in the Middle East to his résumé is more important than responsibly tending to the needs and interests of the 170,000 working Ontarians who make up CUPE Ontario ("Jewish CUPE members upset at union resolution," CJN, June 8). Too bad his actions are sparking divisions within the union and squandering the resources that are the sustenance of a union – unity, trust and credibility. If Ryan, armed with the resolution, with its inflammatory rhetoric and one-dimensional understanding of the Middle East crisis, believes he can contribute to peacemaking, he only needs to look at the damage he is wreaking in his own union to see the likely outcome of his efforts.

Ontario has legislation forbidding union leaders from using unions for purposes that are detrimental to their members. I trust the membership and CUPE National will assert their authority and relieve Ryan of the burden of leadership so that he can tackle the world's problems alone.

Tim Greenwood
Newmarket, Ont.

It bothers me that the Canadian Union of Public Employees' Ontario branch has singled out Israel for special prejudicial treatment ("CUPE votes to boycott Israel," CJN, June 1). Why, for instance, do they not look at the cause of Jews who were brutally pushed out of Arab countries after World War II?

Israel is perhaps the best example of a country that has decided to take passive measures with its security wall to manage a refugee and terrorism problem created and promoted by Arab nations and maintained ad infinitum by the United Nations. CUPE wants Israel destroyed by opening the floodgates to both Palestinian immigration and more terrorists – yeah, sure!

More disturbing is the fact that any union would use its membership dues to advance the political goals of the union's leaders. There are enough issues related to the health, working conditions and welfare of their members to keep unions busy.

I urge CUPE members in Ontario to withhold their dues or collectively go to the courts to make sure the unions and especially CUPE Ontario president Sid Ryan are doing their work.

Gary Gerofsky
Dundas, Ont.

I am writing to express my utmost support and encouragement for CUPE Ontario's recent resolution to support Palestinian rights through targeted divestment from Israel ("CUPE votes to boycott Israel," CJN, June 1).

CUPE Ontario is doing a huge service to Israel by speaking out against its illegal and hurtful actions in the West Bank and Gaza, and by following up that rhetoric with a campaign that seeks to correct the oppression of millions of Palestinians. Targeted sanctions and boycotts, such as those CUPE is endorsing, aim right at the infrastructure of the Israeli occupation. The European Union has been doing this for several years now, demanding illegal Israeli settlement products be labelled and taxed heavily. CUPE is expanding this effort by boycotting goods and services related to the occupation of the West Bank and Gaza, not at the general Israeli public.

I ask CUPE to hold its ground in the midst of misguided and reactionary opposition rooted in the assumption that to be anti-occupation is to be anti-Israel.

Barenboim is pro-Israel

Jack Chivo has made sweeping and denigrating accusations about Daniel Barenboim, to which many members of the Canadian Jewish community would take great exception, myself included ("Films celebrated anti-Israel activists," letters, CJN, May 25). In my view, this fine musician is pro-Israel, because he recognizes the disastrous path Israel is on, fraught with both moral and political dangers.

I recall the predictions of the late great scientist, religious philosopher and social critic Yeshayahu Leibowitz. Starting in 1967 after the Six Day War, he strongly cautioned Israel against becoming the occupier of another people, lest it lead inevitably to moral corruption and political decrepitude.

Sadly, I am repeatedly shocked to see how far down this path the people and State of Israel have gone in the last 40 years.

My family's store, Ontario Paint and Wallpaper, established in 1913 at 275 Queen St. E. in Toronto, is the oldest paint store in the city and is still run by its founding family ("Rejuvenate your home with quality paints," No Place Like Home, CJN, May 18.) My late grandparents, Max and Mary Ackerman, started the business and my late father, Morris Ackerman, ran it with my grandmother (who passed away in 1992) until he died in 2003. # Finding parts of myself on a Moroccan holiday

By SUSAN KRASHINSKY

"Sunny Asilah is the perfect beach retreat!" my brother Jon screamed over the roar of rain and wind-whipped sea mist, quoting the guidebook that had led us to this small Moroccan town.

I was in no mood for irony. The trip was hardly going as planned. I am usually so cowardly that I can barely board a plane without vigorous pep talks and my chamsa necklace – a talisman for protection – secured around my neck. I had boarded three separate planes, a bus, a ferry and a train just to get to Asilah, and I wanted results.

We had come chiefly to do postcard-perfect vacation activities, such as getting sand in our bathing suits and cultivating skin damage. Now we were reduced to leaving our room with forced glee at the prospect of walking along the sopping beach swaddled in sweaters and glorified garbage bags that masqueraded as emergency raincoats. We never thought we'd actually need rain gear. It was May in North Africa, for goodness' sake.

But we were grimly determined to enjoy ourselves, and so we forged on, reading things to each other out of the guide book.

"The Portuguese built the walls of the old city in the 15th century!" I would proclaim through gritted teeth. "They're so imposing and beautiful!" Jon would gamely reply, shivering in the downpour.

To escape the site of our holiday defeat, we opted to walk a little ways out of the centre of town. As we wandered along the shoreline, we suddenly spotted what looked like a ruined building. It was perched above us, atop a small rise of land that curved upward from the ocean. When we clambered up to have a look, we saw that the building was actually a simple tomb. We had found an entire cemetery. The place was overgrown with wildflowers. Many of the gravestones were worn down by time, and all that remained of their former carvings were nearly imperceptible bumps on otherwise flat stone surfaces.

They were so worn, in fact, that I was worried that the contents of the graves might be partly exposed. They were not the lumps of earth that many westerners associate with cemeteries. Rather, each grave looked like its own miniature tomb, with a stone coffin set above ground and marked at the top. But I noted with discomfort that some of these covering stones were partly broken. So when Jon shouted for me to come look at something, I began hopping anxiously from one foot to another, like a cartoon housewife who had spotted a mouse.

"Can you see the dead person?" I whimpered. "Don't show me if it's a dead person."

Once he coaxed me into going over, I saw what had made my brother call me so urgently. The gravestone was carved with Hebrew writing. These stones weren't tombs. They were traditional Jewish graves. We had found an abandoned Jewish cemetery.

My relationship to the Jews of Morocco is tenuous at best. The closest link I have to them is that I reside in Montreal alongside the largest Moroccan Jewish community in Canada. During our stay in Morocco, my brother and I would come face to face with pieces of a Jewish past that, admittedly, was not our history. But the emotional link I felt was palpable, echoing the history that I can read in my own bones: the pogroms, the emigration and the hope for a better life somewhere else.

We would tour the mellah – the Jewish quarter – in Fez, its winding, narrow streets that, for all intents and purposes, looked just like the crowded Jewish neighbourhoods in eastern Europe where our family once lived and from where they would eventually have to flee. We ran down to the beach to find rocks to place on some of the graves, and said Kaddish for the dead who lay in the cemetery with no family to tend to the graves or leave little stones as indications of their visits.

We didn't have much time to spend there. The formerly public cemetery was now surrounded by a wall. We only managed to access it by approaching from the beach. The owner of the property soon came out, shaking his head at us and clearly unhappy at our intrusion on his goats' grazing land. We left as many stones as we could and headed back the way we came.

Upon arriving back in the medina (old city), we took refuge in shopping to get out of the rain. We hit a shop that at first looked like all the others. However, as we browsed, we began to notice Jewish ceremonial objects, including oil-burning menorahs, hand-carved metal seder plates, mezuzot and more than one shiviti (a wall hanging hung in synagogues so that one is always aware of God's presence) and mizrach (a wall hanging for the easternmost wall of Jewish homes to indicate the direction of prayer), all no less than 70 years old. The owner told us the objects had come from houses nearby where Jews had once lived.

In 1948, there were 265,000 Jews in Morocco. By 2003, the community had shrunk to 5,500. Even during relatively tolerant times, Jews lived in the confines of the mellah, and at night this was the only place they felt safe, and sometimes they didn't even feel safe there, either.

Yet Morocco can't be written off as just another anti-Semitic country. Jews suffered discrimination under the French during the war, but at the same time, King Muhammad V worked against their deportation. As well, although support for Holocaust denier Roger Garaudy was prevalent in some Moroccan media outlets and in the general population, the popular King Hassan II was a strong supporter of modernism, tolerance and interfaith dialogue. Moroccan leaders have also shown support for the peace process in the Middle East, but it was the increased violence after the establishment of the State of Israel and a subsequent anti-Semitic campaign that drove many Jews away.

The country's relationship to its Jewish community is complex and has its positive side. However, the truth remains that the majority of Morocco's Jews pulled up stakes en masse. The quality of life they faced in Morocco pushed them to leave, and to leave things behind.

"My grandfather found them," the owner of the shop explained, referring to his merchandise. I thought of the graves we had just come from, which had also been deserted by necessity. For the first time, I was forced to really consider my moral position on looting. If his grandfather had not taken these things, surely someone else would have. Their rightful owners certainly weren't coming back for them. But could I really resign myself to this person making a living off the death of a community? On the other hand, in a country with 20 per cent unemployment, was I in any position to judge?

While Jon asked more questions about the history of the area, I had fallen to looking at a silver chamsa, carved in beautiful curving lines with a Star of David in the centre of the palm. Though larger than my necklace, the design of the wall hanging was remarkably similar. My family may not have come from Morocco, but the communities that existed here were still Jews, and with them I shared the stories, rituals and symbols that link us together throughout the Diaspora.

Muslims have a chamsa symbol too: the hand of Fatimah. Like their Muslim neighbours, many Moroccan Jews believed in jinn, evil spirits against which they felt it was necessary to protect themselves. These are the kind of "superstitions" that modern Jews began to shun upon coming to the New World and that some now look upon with suspicion.

But I have always been taken by this symbol. My chamsa necklace, without which no flight is now complete, was one of the few things I bought when I went to Israel, during a visit to the mystical city of Safed. Does it have the magical power to ward off evil spirits? Everyone chooses how literally they believe in the symbols of their culture. All I know is that it gets me through plane rides.

Granted, I am a traveller now for very different reasons. Growing up in Canada, my family has never had to consider uprooting itself suddenly in order to survive. We have never had to leave our most cherished belongings behind, and we never had to accept the knowledge that we would never again be able to visit the graves of our loved ones. But as our ancestors spread themselves across the globe, we have carried the same symbols with us. The image of the protective hand speaks to me of the need for spiritual, and not just physical, shelter. And as I walked beside my brother through Asilah's old city, the aged chamsa clutched in my hand, I thought that ours is a culture in flux. From everywhere we must eventually part and leave remnants of ourselves.

An issue we must address

Israeli author A.B. Yehoshua caused something of a furor at last month's Centennial Symposium of the American Jewish Committee. As a panelist discussing "The future of the past: What will become of the Jewish people," the irascible luminary of Israeli literature waded headlong into controversy with comments that stunned his hosts and many in his audience.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

What Yehoshua was on about was what he perceived as the self-evident viewpoint that to live a fully Jewish life, one had to commit to living in Israel. He inferred that it's only there, and not in the Diaspora, that a "significant Jewish identity" is realizable.

Needless to say, his remarks triggered a deluge of comments and criticisms, including a series of articles in Ha'aretz. Some supported his position, while others saw the need for damage control and a more placatory approach to the Israeli-Diaspora duality.

But inasmuch as the AJC symposium evoked controversy, it has nonetheless unmasked a simmering tension in an essential relationship that goes way beyond parochialism, pragmatism, or paternalistic rivalries. It speaks to the very essence of Jewish peoplehood in the 21st century.

At the core of the problem is the apparent inability of each side to understand the other's values and perspectives. For instance, it's well recognized that in Israeli schools, students are taught very little about the lives of Jews in the Diaspora or the important existential issues that confront them on a day-to-day basis. And look, too, at the not-infrequent disconnectedness between Israelis living in the Diaspora and indigenous Jewish communities in their host countries. It's no secret that many of these Israelis tend not to participate in the activities of their adopted communities, attend their institutions, or contribute materially to their well-being.

At the other end of the spectrum, and using American Jewry as the example, it's especially disturbing that a national survey conducted for the AJC in 1989, found that 73 per cent of Jews agreed that "caring about Israel is a very important part of my being a Jew," while by 2005, only 57 per cent supported this concept. Moreover, it was found, not surprisingly, that younger adults exhibited much-weaker attachments to Israel than their elders.

The writing must surely be on the wall for both the Jews of Israel and the Jews of the Diaspora. Regardless of background, there desperately needs to be a renewal of the partnership that reinforces the notion of an Am Yisrael whose strength and endurance stem from unity, common purpose, and mutual understanding.

In this context, it's not especially relevant whether Yehoshua's perceptions are right or wrong. What's so much more pertinent is that he has drawn attention to an issue that we dare not ignore.

Unloading some baggage before my vacation

I am counting the days with great anticipation. Four more and I will be winging my way northward through azure skies towards Denmark, long a second home for us through my wife. It will be a pleasure to get away from this seething pot of a country for some relaxation in the serene detachment of Scandinavia. Denmark and Israel are polar opposites, and they appeal, each in its own way, to the schizophrenic extremes in my personality. Born and raised in Canada, I have spent the better part of my life in Israel and live equally well with cold and hot, fog and aridity, forests and deserts, falafel and pickled herring, Mediterranean ebullience and chill northern reserve.

Ross Culiner in Jerusalem

It takes getting away, I find, to fully realize how tiring and trying life in Israel can be. Not only does that conspiracy of hate and hostility around us exact a toll on one's nerves, but we Israelis aren't exactly the easiest people to get along with, either. An indigenous aggressive streak, aggravated by an acute egocentricity, repeatedly transforms what ought to be routine social interactions into confrontations.

But there is something else, more troubling, that is eating away at me these days and I can only blame myself for it. After all, nobody forced me to be such a hopeless idealist, to fall so in love with the inspiring notion of a modern Jewish homeland that I am unforgiving of any behaviour or individual that would debase what I view as a noble and historic cause. However, my recent conversations with people from all walks of life indicate that I am not alone in my grave disappointment with the current state of affairs. The sense that something is indeed rotten in Israel, if not in the Kingdom of Denmark, is dangerously widespread.

The daily news is a good barometer of the seriousness of the condition – nothing but a monotonous litany of indescribable horrors. Hardly a single corner of our national life has been spared the destructive influence of corruption, starting with law enforcement agencies themselves and filtering up through the entire system to the very top of the political and religious pyramid. Prime ministers and their families, rabbis and theirs, and possibly even illustrious Nobel Prize winners are not exempt from its influence. Moreover, organized crime, both imported and homegrown, has spread its tentacles everywhere. The diseased tissue can be detected throughout.

The catalogue of our other present-day social ills is long, varied and ugly – gangland murders, family and youth violence, spreading pockets of abject poverty, ubiquitous alcohol and drug abuse, sex slavery and molestation, maltreatment of foreign workers, a callous Jewish messianism, and many further manifestations of a society in distress. Whereas once we boasted proudly that the streets of the Jewish state were safe, sound and basically clean, today we cannot.

And, meanwhile, the slaughter on the roads continues unabated. We moan and mourn over the tragedies inflicted on us by our enemies, and then, hypocrites that we surely are, thoughtlessly exact an even steeper price in Israeli lives with our very own hands. The damage of Hamas and Hezbollah are mere pin pricks compared to the rivers of Jewish blood we send coursing down our highways day in, day out.

And now, seeing as I'm already getting things off my chest before my sojourn in Denmark, I will also add a lament for the wanton contamination of our limited and precious river systems, the massive littering of our countryside and beaches, the neglect in our two biggest cities, Tel Aviv and Jerusalem, where but a few short blocks away from their well-groomed centres can be found urban wastelands, architectural and human, that would be right at home in the Third World.

Good. I feel better now. I am ready to leave this beloved land of mine, this marvel of achievement and catastrophe of underachievement for a few days of rest and reflection. I will admire, as always, a Danish society that is more civilized, honourable, compassionate and responsibly well-managed than my own. After which I will return home and continue dreaming, perhaps naively, of how we might have been, had we truly wanted to be, a light unto the nations.

Anti-Israel obsessions

The latest onslaughts in the political war against Israel have come from trade unions in Canada (the Ontario branch of CUPE – the Canadian Union of Public Employees) and Britain (the National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education). Last month, both groups passed resolutions using the demonization rhetoric of the 2001 World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa, which revived the "Zionism is racism" agenda. The union resolutions also promote sanctions and boycotts – the preferred method of turning Israel into the new "apartheid regime" and preparing the foundation for its destruction.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

These and similar attacks from non-governmental organizations (NGOs) flying the false flags of human rights and humanitarian aid are marked by the huge level of ignorance that's used to justify anti-Israel obsessions.

In his opening speech, Paul Mackney, NATFHE's general secretary, highlighted the pressing issues on the agenda: the problems facing public sector unions in the United Kingdom, the crisis in education, and, of course, the situation in "Palestine."

Here, Mackney claimed great expertise, overcoming his lack of education in international relations or the Middle East. Repeating the rhetoric of Durban, he dispensed with the history and evidence, including the Arab rejectionism, incitement and violence. Instead, Mackney poured out a stream of data purporting to compare Palestinian suffering to that of Israelis in terms of casualties, unemployment, education, aid, and other spheres. His claims are based on bogus statistics repeated from Palestinian propaganda sheets. And there was no mention of Palestinian incitement, corruption and the internal anarchy in the Palestinians' terrorist proto-state. It was a triumph of ignorance.

In Canada, Sid Ryan, the head of CUPE, displayed an equally toxic combination of hatred and ignorance in promoting the Durban strategy and repeating the "apartheid" slogans. Ryan seems to have adopted the words of Rafeef Ziadah, a Palestinian whose presence is noted in many extremist anti-Israeli activities, including "Israel Apartheid Week" this past school year at the University of Toronto. Ryan's call for a boycott campaign until Israel "meets its obligation to recognize the Palestinian people's inalienable right to self-determination" totally erases Palestinian rejectionism and terror. And the promotion of the Palestinian myth of a "right of return" for refugees is tantamount to calling for the destruction of Israel. The absurdity of CUPE's move was highlighted by the resolution's rubber-stamping by all of Ryan's 896 "delegates" – Stalin could not have done better.

To their credit, many Canadian analysts and letter writers have highlighted Ryan's ignorance, and the Globe and Mail printed a point-by-point critique by Natan Sharansky. The extent of the damage is unknown, but the belated counterattack is important, if insufficient. Like Hitler's great lies, the slogans and rhetoric of the Durban strategy have become deeply embedded in the media and universities, and among NGO officials who fly the false flags of human rights.

To take the offensive and defeat the armies fighting this political war to destroy Israel, it's necessary to focus the public debate on their obsessions. For many years, the officials at Human Rights Watch, based in the United States, and Christian Aid, based in the United Kingdom, were able to devote a huge and disproportionate portion of donations to promote the slogans and myths used to attack Israel.

After NGO Monitor exposed this obsession, and demonstrated its inherent racism and anti-Semitism, the extremists in both groups were forced to retreat. In the past 18 months, the volume of HRW attacks against Israel has dropped to less than one-quarter of what they were, and human rights violations in Syria, Libya, Saudi Arabia, and by Palestinian terrorists have suddenly been discovered. A recent study of Amnesty International's obsessive ideological agenda may have a similar impact.

Similarly, the Canadian government needs to halt the millions of taxpayer dollars provided by CIDA and other agencies to NGOs promoting the propaganda echoed by CUPE. Recipients in this category have included Alternatives (based in Montreal), BADIL, the deceptively named "Medical Aid for Palestinians," World Vision and UNRWA.

In addition, co-operation and educational activities involving serious labour leaders need to be increased, including sponsoring trips to Israel to dispel the myths. And the role of Arab extremists such as Rafeef Ziadah in CUPE, as well as the source of the funding for these activities, should be examined.

Finally, a members' revolt to remove union officials who promote this self-destructive and obsessive agenda would send a very powerful message.

The Kirshner File

Novelist Henry Roth was rediscovered

I read Call It Sleep, Henry Roth's magisterial American coming-of-age novel, in 1964, when I was a teenager in Montreal. The novel, a classic of immigration and proletarian fiction about a hypersensitive Jewish boy coping with the puzzling mysteries of life, left a profound impression on me and many of my contemporaries. Since then, Call It Sleep has been printed in some 30 editions and sold more than a million copies. Not bad for a book that slipped into a black hole of utter obscurity after its publication in 1934.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Roth, born in a shtetl in the Austro-Hungarian Empire in 1906, was so devastated by its anemic showing that he virtually stopped writing and went into self-imposed exile in the wilds of Maine as a waterfowl farmer. Nearly six decades would elapse before his second novel, A Star Shines Over Mt. Morris Park, the first instalment of a projected series of six volumes, was published. In point of fact, Roth attempted to write another novel after Call It Sleep's singular lack of success, but gave up after 60 pages and burned the manuscript in a fit of frustration, says Steven Kellman in his splendid biography, Redemption: The Life of Henry Roth (W.W. Norton).

Like the protagonist in his first novel, David Schearl, Roth was a child of Galician immigrants, arriving at Ellis Island with his beloved mother in 1907, the peak year of immigration through the port of New York.

Of the 1.2 million newcomers from eastern Europe who reached the United States in 1907, 149,000, or about 11 per cent, were Jewish. The influx of Jews into New York in the late 19th century and early 20th century increased its Jewish population by 16-fold, from 80,000 in 1880 to 1,250,000 in 1910.

Roth's parents, Leah Farb and Herman Roth, were in an abusive relationship and constantly quarrelled. She doted on her son. He was stingy, moody, abrasive and sometimes violent. Roth did not care for him and said so in his luminous prose, a mix of Joycean techniques and Freudian insights.

The Roths settled in Brownsville – a modest neighbourhood in Brooklyn inhabited mainly by working-class Jewish families – but within a few years, they moved to the impossibly congested Lower East Side. Roth lived there for only four years, but his sharp memories of its decaying tenements and its crowded streets remained deeply imbedded in his soul. In 1914, the Roths moved to cheaper quarters in Harlem, then home to 175,000 Jews. But the part of Harlem where they lived was an Irish and Italian enclave where a Jewish boy had to put up with anti-Semitic taunts.

He attended DeWitt Clinton School, the oldest high school in New York City, and among his classmates were Lionel Trilling, the first Jewish academic to be hired as an English professor by Columbia University, and Nathanael West (Weinstein), the author of such comic novels as Miss Lonelyhearts and The Day of the Locust.

Not being able to afford the tuition at Cornell University, Roth took his degree at City College of New York (CCNY), known as the poor man's Harvard. CCNY, nevertheless, produced distinguished graduates, from literary critic Alfred Kazin to sociologist Nathan Glazer, during the second half of the century. Kellman, a professor of comparative literature at the University of Texas, speculates that Roth was fortunate to have studied at CCNY, which transformed him into a novelist.

There he met Eda Lou Walton, an instructor in English literature who had a formidable influence on him. Considerably older, she took Roth under her wing, encouraging him to develop his talents, introducing him to her literary friends and smoothing out his rough edges. She also became his lover, but Roth was not new to sexual adventures. Well into his college years, he and his sister, Rose, indulged in an incestuous affair, a factor in Roth's lifelong self-loathing.

Roth did not excel academically, but he published his first story, Impressions of a Plumber, in a campus magazine, and wrote Call It Sleep in an astonishing burst of creativity in Walton's Greenwich Village apartment. Based on his childhood experiences, the novel introduced readers to a stream-of- consciousness narrative, a corrosive family triangle, a preoccupation with sexuality and a belief in the restorative powers of sleep.

Printed in a first edition of 1,500 copies, Call It Sleep generally elicited fine reviews and glowing appraisals comparing Roth to James T. Farrell and James Joyce. But after the second edition was released, demand waned and the remainders were pulped. In short order, Roth's publisher went bankrupt and Call It Sleep faded away.

Maxwell Perkins, the famous New York editor, signed up Roth for a book deal in the expectation that he would not be a one-novel wonder. Roth, having recently joined the Communist party, began writing a novel about a working-class hero. But he abandoned it as his relationship with Walton, his mentor, deteriorated. According to Kellman, Roth was the victim of a writer's block, though he kept on writing the occasional short story for The New Yorker during his dark, silent years.

The young Henry Roth

Roth met his wife, Muriel Parker, a promising musician who had studied in Paris with the teacher and conductor Nadia Boulanger, during this unsettled period. She was raised in Oak Park, Ill., the Chicago suburb where Ernest Hemingway was born. Roth found her as radiant as the morning sunshine, but he was not particularly impressed by her snobbish parents. Parker's father, expounding on the merits of the Kiwanis Club, told Roth: "Of course, while membership in Kiwanis is open to people of all faiths, Jewish as well as others, we don't want any kikes in this organization."

In 1938, with the country mired in the Depression, Roth travelled to Hollywood in the hope of selling Call It Sleep to a studio and perhaps launching a career as a scriptwriter. But the novel, Kellman tartly observes, was "an embarrassing reminder of the immigrant Jewish origins of many Hollywood producers." Roth went back to New York City, humiliated and disenchanted.

Desperate for work, he took successive jobs as a ditch digger and metal grinder. Since he was classified as an "essential worker," he was not drafted after the U.S. declared war on Japan following Pearl Harbor.

Kellman believes that Roth, a universalist who rejected the rituals of Judaism, was unaffected by the plight of Jews under the Nazis. He would regret his indifference.

With the onset of the Cold War, Roth decided it would be prudent to keep a low profile and cut ties with his old Communist friends in New York. He bought a 110-acre farm near Montville, Me., and resided there with his wife and two children in a tumbledown house lacking central heating, indoor plumbing and electricity.

To make ends meet, Roth took what jobs were available. He cleared brush, gathered and chopped wood, picked apples and blueberries, sold maple syrup, fought forest fires and taught in a one-room schoolhouse. For a while, he was a precision toolmaker at the Singer Sewing Machine Company and an orderly in a hospital.

Desperate to be financially independent, he started Roth's Waterfowl, a family operation specializing in the extraction of meat and feathers from ducks and geese. He wrote a primer on waterfowl, and though it was hardly literature, Roth regarded it as a tantalizing intimation that writing was still in his blood.

In 1960, when Roth was still plucking duck feathers, Commentary published an essay by Leslie Fiedler titled Henry Roth's Neglected Masterpiece. "For sheer virtuosity, Call It Sleep is hard to beat," he exulted. "No one has ever distilled such poetry and wit from the counterpoint between the maimed English and the subtle Yiddish of the immigrant. No one has reproduced so sensitively the terror of family life in the imagination of a child caught between two cultures." Within a year, Call It Sleep was back in print after a hiatus of almost 26 years. Irving Howe, in a rhapsodic front-page essay in the New York Times Book Review, hailed it as a masterpiece.

During much of his life, Roth was a staunch atheist. As late as 1963, when asked to contribute to a symposium in the American Zionist magazine Midstream on The Meaning of Galut in America Today, Roth claimed that Jewishness was an anachronism that he had discarded. But with Israel's victory in the Six Day War, Roth underwent a transformation. The 1967 war traumatized and Zionized him, and from then on, he identified with the Jewish people and even considered aliyah.

Roth died in 1995 in New Mexico, a titan in the pantheon of American literature whose manifest talents had been almost overlooked. Kellman, in this impressive biography, puts his life into perspective and pays him his due.

Future leaders emerge from Jewish schools

By Carla Lancit

Aaron Lesser decided to run for president of the student council at Netivot HaTorah Day School on a whim. "I did it for fun," says the 14-year-old eighth-grade leader.

Apparently, whims can sometimes lead you in the right direction. Lesser says that he's achieved more as president than he could have anticipated, noting that it's a position that has let him take a lot of initiative.

Under Lesser's leadership, the student council has already raised money to help build a school in Honduras and is currently spearheading a project to have hats emblazoned with the name of the school's popular Netivot Panthers basketball team. The proceeds from the sales of the hats will be given to two Israeli-based charities; the One Family Fund which provides care and support to victims of terror in Israel, and the Koby Mandell Foundation, which helps families in Israel deal with the loss of a loved one.

Vice Principal Rabbi Elliott Diamond says that Lesser has demonstrated leadership "by helping to organize programs that have helped our students focus on situations that are important in Israel."

"My parents raised me to give and help as much as you can," says Lesser, who has also played on his school's basketball team and served on the yearbook committee. "It's important to spend as much of your free time helping people."

For more proof that student leaders can be inspired by their parents, look no further than another eighth-grader, Ari Zagdanski, at Associated Hebrew School

"I come from a family that's very pro-Israel," says Zagdanski, 13. "I follow in my parents' footsteps and like to give back to the community." He has already demonstrated that commitment with his money-raising efforts for this year's UJA Federation Walk With Israel.

"Ari is a good student, and when it comes to leadership, he's very well rounded. He's a leader type," says Ruth Portnoy, Judaic studies principal at Associated Hebrew Schools' Danilack Middle School. "He cares. He will do anything for the school. He's involved."

Zagdanski's interests include sports, music, and fundraising. He has sat on student council as a class representative, plays on the school's hockey and volleyball teams, is involved in intramural hockey and basketball, and still finds time to play acoustic guitar.

This year, Zagdanski became heavily involved in an effort to raise funds for Camp Koby, an Israeli summer camp for children who have lost family members in terror attacks, or who have themselves been wounded.

Zagdanski and Lesser intend to continue their involvement in the fall at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) and Yeshivat Or Chaim respectively. And given the leadership they've already demonstrated, this is just the beginning.

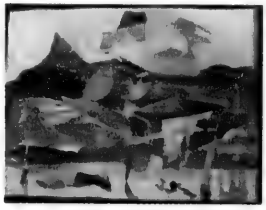
Contest showcases creativity of students

Toronto's day school and supplementary school students are tapping into their creative sides, thanks to a number of UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education (BJE) initiatives.

Among these events is a creative writing contest, which encourages students from grades one to eight to express themselves in English or Hebrew. This year's contest attracted more than 700 entries from 11 schools. The theme - The Voice of Children -allowed students to write on topics of their own choosing, although suggestions were provided for inspiration. "We tried to elicit things that would be very dear to their hearts," says Ora Shulman, director of the BJE's teacher centre. "Some were unbelievable to read."

Another BJE initiative - its third annual art show - brought together drawings, paintings, and sculptures by students ranging from kindergarten to grade 12, from 13 Toronto schools.



This year, the art show included a display of tzedakah boxes created by students. Local Jewish artists worked with them to create the boxes. The materials ranged from fabric to ceramic, demonstrating the endless possibilities for creating traditional objects while drawing students' attention to the mitzvah of tzedakah.

In addition to encouraging students to pursue their talents, Shulman hopes that these creative enterprises will strengthen the feeling of community among the many Toronto Jewish schools. "It brings all the day and supplementary schools together for the occasion," she says. "They find out they are part of a larger community by meeting students from the entire Toronto area."

Visit the BJE website at www.bjetoronto.org to read the winning entries in the creative writing contest and to view selected pieces from the art show & tzedakah box project.

Jewish ingredient flavours school subjects

How do you teach kids to become proud Jews in math class? At the Toronto Heschel School it comes down to one word: integration. That means integrating Jewish content into everything the school teaches.

"A lot of schools use integration," says curriculum director Greg Beiles. "For instance in math class they count Chanukah candles instead of counting beans. We're trying to go a bit deeper than that."

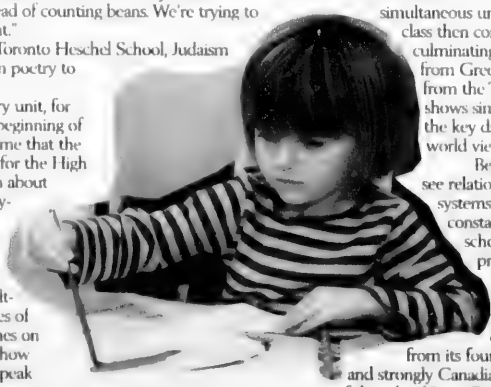
The grade five poetry unit, for example, comes at the beginning of the year—around the time that the school is also preparing for the High Holidays. Students learn about metaphor through studying the prayer "Avinu Malkeinu" in which God is referred to as a father and as a king. On the surface the resulting lesson is about figures of speech, but it also touches on the nature of God, and how metaphor allows us to speak about Him.



In eighth grade science, a midrash (often a story explaining a Biblical passage) illustrates scientific methodology. Students study the story—in which Abraham observes the sun and the moon and deduces that there must be a higher power. From this midrash Heschel teachers note the parallels between Abraham's thought process and the steps of the scientific method.

The school also attempts to draw parallels between secular history and Jewish history. A unit on ancient Mesopotamia, for example, places Abraham in historical context. When students learn about ancient Greece, a simultaneous unit covers Iron Age Israel. The class then compares the two cultures, culminating in a play in which a hero from Greek mythology and a character from the Torah meet. "The conversation shows similarities," says Beiles, "but also the key differences between a Jewish world view and an ancient Greek one."

Beiles believes that the ability to see relationships between thought systems is good for learning, and he is constantly impressed that the school's students can make profound and deep connections between things from a very young age.

The school's emphasis on integration springs directly from its founding. "Being strongly Jewish and strongly Canadian has always been the vision of the school," says Beiles.

"We want our kids to understand that they are both part of a Canadian Western culture and society and a Jewish culture and society, and that they interact with each other," he says. "There are a lot of similarities, and a lot of differences."

Meet some of this year's kindergarten graduates

By Carla Lanclt

Don't expect any crocodile tears when Trevor Wajs starts first grade in the fall. According to mom Marcy Wajs, the Leo Baeck student already thinks he runs the school.

"He walks in every day and says hello to all the teachers by name, even the ones who don't teach him," she says. "He has absolutely no trepidation about grade one. He is really looking forward to being 'upstairs' and having projects and all the things his brothers have been doing for the last few years."

In fact, the only complication that Wajs anticipates is getting Trevor to move between classrooms without stopping for too long to chat in the hallways.

Wajs and her husband Richard plan to prepare Trevor for the move to grade school with a series of discussions about what is expected of him. "I will explain to him that he is to set a good example for the other kids in the class by listening to the teacher and doing what he is told," she says. "I will tell him how proud we will be of him when he helps his friends who may be scared."

Seeing her son ready himself for the move up is a source of tremendous pride to Marcy, a passionate supporter of Jewish education.

"To me, the importance of a Jewish education is to develop a Jewish identity and to learn about Jewish traditions, and how they developed as they did," she says. "Leo Baeck has a strong focus on Derech Eretz (respect for others) and tzedakah, and those are some of the Jewish values that I want my kids to learn and practice in their lives. I also want them to have a Jewish education to develop a strong knowledge about Israel, why it exists and why we must support Israel and keep our own Jewish community strong."

Jamie and Susan Blatt are also preparing their son, Josh, to enter first grade in the fall.

"We love the fact that the kids all sing the Shabbat songs at home, they all know the songs for the holidays," says Jamie. "That's part of the joy of having them in Jewish day school; it reflects our traditions, our lifestyle and our appreciation for Israel."

According to Blatt, Josh has already leapt over the biggest hurdle—moving from the half-day of junior kindergarten to senior kindergarten's full-day program.

Josh, like Trevor, is getting excited about the change, thanks in part to the school's "moving up" ceremony. "A lot of practice went into it," says Blatt.

If Josh and Trevor are looking forward to first grade unreservedly, their parents may have a few reservations. As Wajs says: "I personally have absolutely no worries about the transition into grade one for Trevor except that it means my baby is really grown up and that makes me sad."

Torontonian wins International Bible Contest

A recent international competition proves that Toronto has a lot to be proud of when it comes to Biblical learning

Yisrael Witty, a grade 10 student at Yeshivat Or Chaim, placed first in the Diaspora portion of the International Bible Contest held recently in Israel. Witty and fellow Or Chaim student David Pellow, came in fourth and fifth respectively in the international competition. The first three spots were claimed by Israeli students.

"We encourage participation in the Bible contest very much," says Or Chaim's Rosh Yeshiva (head of the school) Rabbi Shlomo Gemara. "It became a tradition that the strong boys have to compete."

The boys from Or Chaim and the girls from Ulpanat Orot, the yeshiva's sister school, fostered a team atmosphere, meeting with Rabbi Gemara's wife Ofra once a week to prepare and go over practice questions.

Silvia Eilath is not surprised by the Torontonians' strong showing. "We have amazing coaches, very devoted teachers," says the coordinator of the Bible Contest for UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education. "They go beyond the call of duty. They instill the love of the Book. They develop a passion for it. It's amazing." Gemara, however, credits Eilath with Toronto's success in the contest. "She works so hard and with such enthusiasm that it's really contagious," he says

Pellow has a long history of success in the contest. He won both the 5-6 division and the 7-8 division before going on to win the high school division and represent Canada in Israel. He says that he prepared for the contest for a year in advance. "I was expecting it to be hard, and it was."

Witty chalks up his success to plenty of hard work and repetition. "I've been working on this for a whole year," he says. "All the energy and time I've devoted to it came to fruition."

"He didn't go anywhere without his Tanach (Bible, including the Prophets) for a full year," says his mother, Laya Witty. "He went to the National Boy Scout Jamboree in the U.S., and he had it with him the whole time."

His upbringing also played a role. His father teaches at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), and his mother has a degree in Judaic studies. "My family emphasizes Torah learning as very important," says Witty. "My parents have generally encouraged me to enter this sort of event where I'll be challenged and have a long term goal. But they try not to put any pressure on me."

The importance of Torah learning was also imparted by his late grandfather, Rabbi Irwin Witty, who served as executive director of the BJE. "My father-in-law believed in the study of Tanach," says Laya Witty. "That kind of stuff rubs off on kids before they can even read it themselves."

Yisrael Witty and his grandfather studied together, and once started learning the Book of Daniel, which was part of this year's contest

Witty was pleased that the atmosphere at the contest was friendly. "There was an atmosphere of competition, but not of 'I have to beat you.' Everyone would study together, hang out together—it was a very friendly atmosphere, as if we were all working together to the same goal."

On May 15, Witty and Pellow were honoured at the Canadian National Bible Contest. One hundred and forty students came from Victoria, Winnipeg, Ottawa, Hamilton, Kitchener, Toronto, and Montreal to participate in the contest.

The winners included Lily Chapnik of Temple Kol Ami (English Division, Grades 5-6), Zachary Zarnett-Klein of Associated Posluns (Hebrew Division, Grades 5-6), and, continuing the family tradition, Rivka Witty of Netivot HaTorah (Hebrew Division, Grades 7-8).

Three winners of the High School Division will represent Canada at the International Bible Contest next year. They are CHAT's Josh Satok (first place), independent student A.J. Warner (second place), and Herzliah Snowdon's Emilie Bohbot from Montreal.

As for Witty, he's already "looking for another world to conquer."

Harbord plans new memorial to honour soldiers

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Former students of Harbord Collegiate Institute, which opened in 1892 and has a strong multicultural history, are working on projects to honour the memory of soldiers who perished in both world wars.

On Remembrance Day 2005, after an active fundraising campaign to restore Our Soldier, the World War I monument dedicated in 1921 that was urgently in need of repair, the monument was rededicated in the presence of students, alumni and many distinguished guests.

"Now we must turn to the second part of our challenge," says Murray Rubin, a retired pharmacist who is spearheading the Harbord Remembers fundraising campaign that will honour the memory of the many Harbordites who lost their lives in World War II.

The 1950 graduate, who is an active member of the Harbord Club, a network of more than 2,000 alumni, has embarked on the task of reaching former students, teachers and relatives of the fallen soldiers and asking them to participate in the creation of the new memorial.

When it is completed, the monument will proudly and permanently honour another generation of Harbordites whose lives were lost in World War II, says Rubin.

The war monument committee has commissioned internationally renowned architect and sculptor Morton Katz, a graduate of Harbord, to create the new memorial. The monument is stainless steel and stands 18 feet high in the dual form of a separated "H", the emblem of Harbord Collegiate.

The severing of the form, Katz explains, is representative of the lives cut short in the war. The names are memorialized on stainless steel plaques recessed at eye level into the inner sides of the "H".

He adds that the new memorial sculpture will be located in the sunken courtyard at the east side of Harbord Collegiate at a distance from, but in concert with, the Our Soldier memorial. It will be dedicated on VE Day next year.

"We have raised $53,000," Rubin says. "Once again, The W. Garfield Weston Foundation has most generously launched our campaign with a donation of $20,000, but we must now find another $45,000.

He spoke of Jewish heroes such as Lou Somers, a pilot in the Royal Canadian Air Force who allowed his crew to bail out but went down with his plane after it was shot down over Holland. The plane was not found for 25 years.

For more information on the Harbord Remembers campaign, visit its website www.harbordclub.com or call Rubin at 416 483 0985.

Intellectual knowledge and spirituality

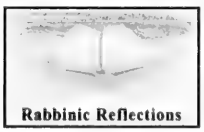
By RABBI DAVID CADOCH

The "celebration" of Shavuot has recently concluded. When we speak of celebration, however, we usually mean special rituals and customs similar to those of Passover, Sukkot, Purim and Chanukah.



In each of these Jewish holidays, there is a definite, established celebration through various rituals and customs. On Shavuot, there is the custom of staying up all night and learning Torah. There is, as well, the custom of partaking of dairy dishes to symbolize that the Torah permitted us to use a product from a live animal.

By biblical law, we are forbidden to eat any substance from a live kosher animal unless it has been ritually slaughtered by the prescribed Torah method of shchitah. Torah law specifically permitted us the use of milk from a kosher animal. Hence we have the custom of eating dairy and this way declaring our adherence to what Torah law has permitted us.

We also have the obligation to recite the Ten Commandments since Shavuot commemorates the giving of the Torah on Mount Sinai (Matan Torah). In some communities, it is the custom to throw water at the rabbi of the synagogue as a symbol of recognition, for the rabbi represents the live teaching of Torah. Water has always been the symbol of Torah as it flows in every place, even in the most hidden crevices.

Rabbi Akiva's moment of enlightenment came after he had observed the way drops of water can erode a hard stone. Puzzled by this enigma, Rabbi Akiva posed an interesting question: how is it that something as soft as water has the power to erode solid rock? This question is at the heart of many spiritual quests.

When one speaks of spirituality, the connotation is usually of practices used to transcend the normal course of everyday living. At least this is the goal of all Eastern religions. What does Torah Judaism have to say about spirituality? Is it a state of being? Is it an intellectual pursuit? I'm going to attempt to answer this somewhat complex question in a simple and concise manner.

The foundation of Torah Judaism is its emphasis on study, as the Talmud explains in Kiddushin 40b.

The sages were together in Nia's house in Lod one day, debating the question of the relative importance of study and practice. Rabbi Tarfone said that practice was most important, while Rabbi Akiva said that study was more important. The rabbis finally came to an agreement and said that learning Torah is greater, for learning leads one to do mitzvot.

The Torah in Parshah Eikev (Deut. 5, 1) says: "And Moses called unto all Israel and said to them, 'Hear O Israel the statutes and judgments that I speak to your ears this day, that you may learn [study] them and observe to practise them.'"

In other words, spiritual practices can only be reinforced by learning them. On the other hand, practices devoid of learning are not enough, as this leads to many errors and misinterpretations.

The willingness to accept the Torah, through study leading to practice, is the essence of Shavuot. Unless one has accepted the Torah for oneself, HaShem's giving the Torah remains a pure intellectual pursuit, as any secular subject is and not a spiritual fulfilling experience.

Kids must be safe – at all costs

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

Virtually all of us see our children as the precious core of our lives. The commitments and sacrifices made for kids, and made with a full and willing heart, are testimony to this fact. And yet, it has become increasingly clear that, in some cases, there has not been sufficient vigilance with regard to ensuring the most basic right our children can expect from us – simple protection from harm. To compound the problem, this lack of safety has occurred in the one place where it should least happen: our schools. In the guise of education comes anger, intolerance and even abuse.

Recent reports out of New York and other places have painted disturbing portraits of children in Jewish schools being sexually abused by their teachers, and in some cases by trusted rabbinic figures. The natural response is to view such occurrences as tragic but limited in scope and certainly not indicative of a larger pattern of concern.

The dark end of the spectrum of sexual abuse may be relatively restricted, but I do not know of accurate statistics, and I suspect that we should not be overly confident, as many of these incidents are covered up. We need to remind ourselves of a basic reality of many schoolroom situations, which is their fundamental imbalance of power. In the eyes of a child, especially a young one, a teacher has control, even in the supposedly lax environs of modernity.

And with this power comes enormous responsibility. Almost every day in some classroom, there are adults transferring all sorts of unwanted baggage onto children without a requisite self-analysis about their behaviours. Why are the kids in my class subject to my anger and criticism? What did I fantasize that my life as a teacher would be like? Do difficult students disappoint me in ways that make me want to strike back at them? Or, conversely, do I use children to fulfil needs that are inappropriate, be they a need for power or emotional gratification, not to mention more perverse desires?

All teachers "lose it" at some point, and in and of itself that is no crime. Teaching can be highly stressful, but that is all the more reason to have some kind of reality check in place – colleagues, administrators, a professional school structure – to keep teachers both supported and, when necessary, monitored.

And in the case of teachers who actually molest children, it would be a grievous error to think of them as lonely introverts creeping around in alleyways. That is the stuff of movies. In real life, as Rabbi Yosef Blau of Yeshiva University has pointed out, "abusers are often charismatic and talented. Victims are afraid to come forward convinced that no one will believe their accusations."

Parents, schools and Jewish communities must recognize the problem in our midst and not be afraid to admit what we cannot properly assess. At some point, this means aligning with professionals who are experienced in these matters. The reputation of a teacher is not a small thing, and besmirching it is a grave matter indeed. But the traumatizing of children trumps all other considerations, and they must be safe at all costs.

Jewish Life

Everyman* by Philip Roth, Houghton Mifflin Company.

'Everyman' leads a bleak, selfish life

Books
Bernard Baskin

How do we confront the reality of our death? The most common approach is denial. In one way or another, we all do this.

We plan our projects, stretching indefinitely into the future. We believe, every day, that "tomorrow will be another day." We act and feel as if we have all the time in the world. Of death we simply say, "It will come when it comes." We put off the truly important until we "clear the path" and "put out a few fires," take care of the urgencies. But the path is never clear, and the fires keep burning and someday there is no tomorrow.

Philip Roth's novella is about a man who fears death. The unnamed protagonist of Everyman (the title is drawn from the tradition of the morality plays of the middle ages) receives his first inkling of death at his father's funeral.

As the mourners begin, in accordance with Jewish tradition, to pack the grave with dirt "all at once he saw his father's mouth as if there were no coffin, as if the dirt they were throwing into the grave was being deposited straight down on him filling up his mouth."

The author's "everyman" is a financially successful advertising man, but a hapless victim of multiple illnesses who desperately attempts to hold on as his health deteriorates. His troubles begin with a hernia operation at the age of nine and continue over the years with quintuple bypass surgery, a renal artery angioplasty and an obstruction of the left carotid artery, to name but a few.

The good people around him – his brother, a daughter, a nurse – seem only to remind him of the depth of his failure. He is a man gripped by the pain of his own mortality and nothing, not even periods of good health, can allay his fears.

In old age – burdened with the onus of failure and knowledge of the inevitable – he remembers and longs for the lost days of his youth. "For the tubular sprout that was his body and that rode the waves from way out where they began to build, rode them with his arms pointed like an arrowhead and the skinny rest of him following behind like the arrow's shaft, rode them all the way in to where his rib cage scraped against the tiny sharp pebbles and jagged clam shells… and he hustled to his feet… and went lurching through the low surf… into the advancing, green Atlantic, rolling unstoppably toward him like the obstinate fact of the future."

As in other Roth novels, the protagonist must choose between importunate urgings of sexuality and sane behaviour. He marries three times: an early match does not work out and a seemingly successful second one comes to an end with his frivolous infatuation and marriage to an irresponsible and immature young model.

He retires to a condo life on the Jersey shore to take up his long-cherished ambition of painting and teaching art. But soon it all turns to ashes. Death looms and life sputters out to its lonely conclusion.

In this short, superbly written allegorical work Roth chooses to depict a secular, unexceptional man whose bleak and selfish life has been devoid of the substance of spirit or the rich opportunities that life provides. Emerson would have it otherwise. "To leave the world a little better, whether by a healthy child, a garden patch, or a redeemed social condition, to know that one life has breathed easier because you have lived – that is to have succeeded.

World Zionist Congress, Pt. 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Should Israel establish "additional means of marriage and divorce" outside the framework of the official religious bodies?

Should Jewish communities around the world celebrate a Hebrew Language day?

Those are two of the resolutions that will be voted on as delegates from around the world converge in Jerusalem next week to attend the 35th World Zionist Congress. [http://tinyurl.com/n26fo]

Although the issues facing this Congress are important, they aren't causing a stir throughout the Jewish world. But criticisms of irrelevance aren't new. Ismar Schorsch, former chancellor of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America, wrote in 1997: "This week I will leave for Israel to attend the World Zionist Congress along with 37 other delegates from MERCAZ, the official Zionist party of the Conservative movement in the United States. Despite the overblown rhetoric that will be heard in Jerusalem, no one should imagine that this congress is a matter of any consequence." Schorsch criticized a system in which only a small fraction of eligible American Jews actually voted. [http://tinyurl.com/lkpqa]

Eight years later, the numbers continue to fall, in the United States at least. About 108,000 voted in 1997. That dropped to 89,000 in 2002 and just 76,000 this year. "It's regrettable that the number of votes for the elections decreased again," Seymour Reich, past president of the American Zionist Movement told The Forward. "Somehow, the Zionist movement has to become more meaningful to world Jewry." [http://tinyurl.com/nf84k]

The Congress of the Jewish People website does a good job explaining the somewhat arcane system that includes both voting and non-voting delegates. You can also take a look at the composition of the powerful American delegation in which the Reform movement received 55 voting delegates, the Religious movement got 35 and the Conservative movement had 32. Smaller parties shared in the remainder of the 23 American delegates. Delegates from other Jewish communities around the world range from 190 in Israel, 23 in France and 19 in Canada to one each in Austria, Peru and India. [http://congressofthejewishpeople.com/]

You can take a look at the breakdown of how the voting went in Canada [http://tinyurl.com/p3gcm], the United Kingdom [http://tinyurl.com/o5ycs] and Australia. [http://tinyurl.com/r92eq] [http://tinyurl.com/n26fo])

What actually happens at a Congress? You can download and read through the final resolutions from the 34th Zionist Congress from June 2002. [http://tinyurl.com/pckdx] But you may prefer to watch some narrated slide shows to get a feel of that meeting. While the first slide show focuses on the opening ceremonies, the one from the following day takes on a much more sombre tone. Proceedings started with two minutes of silence after a suicide bombing in Jerusalem took the lives of 19 people and injured 74 others. [www.isracast.com/slides/openingnight.swf]

What about this year? Given the criticisms about the lack of interest by the general Jewish community, it makes sense that the 35th Congress is "The Zionist Movement – Innovation and Revitalization." [http://tinyurl.com/n26fo]

And what will those hundreds of delegates be talking about? The 60-page Draft Resolution Booklet contains the resolutions to be considered this year. Here's a sampling:

• To recognize "the multi-faceted nature of the Jewish People and… work to place equal status to all the streams of Judaism."

• "To encourage Jewish youth to consider Israel as their homeland through aliyah, as a fulfilment of the Zionist ideal and as the strength of the Jewish people."

• In light of the "appalling" number of people killed in traffic accidents in Israel (451 in 2003), there should be strict enforcement of the use of hands-free cellphones, helmet requirements for all motorcycle and bicycle users, and mandatory use of child restraints in all moving vehicles. [http://tinyurl.com/ra55v]

Voting on those and the 113 other resolutions will conclude by the time the 35th Congress wraps up next Thursday.

Beth Hatefutsoth plans $30 million overhaul

By JENNA ROSMAN
CJN Intern

Israel's Beth Hatefutsoth, the Nahum Goldmann Museum of the Jewish Diaspora, in Tel Aviv, is embarking on a $30 million (US) overhaul and expansion.

On June 29, Beth Hatefutsoth launches its capital campaign of fundraising, which is to take place over five years.

At the event, the late Andrea (Andy) Bronfman will be honoured with the Distinguished Honorary Award of Beth Hatefutsoth for her contributions to the museum. Past recipients of the award have included Elie Wiesel and Israel's fifth president, Yitzhak Navon.

"We think we should be able to [reach our goal] only if we are able to enrol the Jewish community leadership, in key communities, in the leadership of our body," said Yefet Ozery, director of resource development and overseas relations of Beth Hatefusoth.

Included in the official project proposal is a $5-million (all figures US) renovation plan aimed at upgrading and redesigning permanent exhibitions. The $2.2-million renovation of the museum lobby and ground floor will feature a new ticket counter and a computerized information centre connected with the museum's multimedia archive.

With the modernization of all five of the museum's multimedia resources, "you'll be able to retrieve a film or photo that is in our database or maybe even information about your family genealogy," Ozery said.

He noted that people respond beautifully to what they see at Beth Hatefutsoth, however, "we realize that we have to be on par with the modern technology. [We want to make the museum] more high-tech and interactive."

The museum's expansion is expected to begin as early as 2008.

It is starting the expansion with a $2-million grant from the Claims Conference against Germany, to be used for the upgrading and modernization of permanent exhibits, Ozery said.

Beth Hatefutsoth was established in 1978 and exists to convey the story of the Jewish People from the time of their expulsion from Israel to the present.

It is co-partnered with the Jewish Agency for Israel, and Keren Hayesod (United Israel Appeal), and supported by the government of Israel, the Jewish Agency and the Claims Conference.

A new wing – the Abraham and Edita Spiegal Family Building of Contemporary Jewry – is to be created as part of the museum's expansion. It will focus on the diversity and richness of modern Jewish life.

In addition, the International School for Jewish Peoplehood Studies will be created along with the Jewish Peoplehood Resource Center.

"What we are trying to do [with this school is to] expose generations to Jewish communities spread all over the world," Ozery said.

"We have to know of one another and what's happening in other communities and make that connection. We want Toronto educators and Israeli educators there, dealing with Jewish issues of concern."

The school will work with various agencies including Israel's Ministry of Education and Culture, the Jewish Agency, Partnership 2000, Israel's Ministry of Diaspora Affairs, the Israel Defence Forces, Foreign Ministry training programs and Jewish education frameworks in the Diaspora as well as universities and colleges worldwide.

In 2003, Beth Hatefutsoth was in dire need of funding.

One of the reasons for the funding crisis was the intifadah, which reduced the number of visitors dramatically, Ozery said. During that time, Beth Hatefutsoth saw its visitors fall from 200,000 a year to 60,000. Currently, the museum has about 100,000 visitors, and Ozery is optimistic that this figure will increase by 50,000 in 2007.

In 2005, the Knesset passed the Beth Hatefutsoth Law, declaring the museum a national institution for Jewish communities in Israel and the Diaspora. That ensures the museum will receive $6 million annually from the Israeli government.

Also in 2005, Russian businessman Leonid Nevzlin, who later became chairman of the museum's newly established board of governors, promised to donate $5 million over five years to the institution. "He made it possible for us to expand, to develop, to reach out to communities, to offer programming and to do many other things," Ozery said.

"The international board of governors is also our way of saying we need to evolve, as a centre of Jewish communities wordwide."

Ozery said the younger generation will determine the direction of the Jewish people.

"You have to be able to keep teenagers and the younger generation interested. It's crucial to our existence. Their understanding of what binds us together and what a Jew in Montreal, Toronto and Tel Aviv have in common [is important]," he said.

"You want them to be interested. And [we] won't be able to achieve that unless [the centre] is interactive and interesting."

Former chief rabbi of Israel urges Jews to unite

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Just days before his devastating second stroke in January, then-Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon called Rabbi Israel Meir Lau to discuss a government position he had in mind for him in the Kadimah party, the former Ashkenazi chief rabbi of Israel told a Toronto audience last week.

Sharon asked for Rabbi Lau's help addressing two issues: the disconnection between Jews in the Diaspora and Jews in Israel, and the disconnection between Israeli youth and Jewish tradition, said the rabbi, who is now chief rabbi of Tel Aviv. He was speaking to a crowd of almost 1,200 people at the third annual Spirit of Community dinner held by Beth Chabad Israeli Community Centre at Vaughan's Renaissance Parque Centre.

According to the rabbi, the then prime minister said they would speak again about a title and what his position would be. Sharon, however, has been in a coma since Jan. 5.

That conversation explains why he accepted the invitation to Toronto, extended by Rabbi Yisroel Landa, executive director of the host group, said Rabbi Lau, a child survivor of Buchenwald concentration camp. Beth Chabad Israeli Community Centre addresses exactly those two issues, he explained.

A secular Israeli living in the Diaspora needs a connection to Jewish tradition "more than in Israel," said Rabbi Lau, who was born in Poland in 1937 and immigrated to Israel in 1945 with his brother on a ship for orphaned children. "He needs to be sure that his continuity is promised, that his grandchildren will be Jewish, as he is."

He urged his audience "to live in peace and friendship," united against 21st-century "common enemies" including violence, poverty, cancer, AIDS and "all kinds of weapons." Jews in particular, "who taught the world monotheism," must set an example, he said.

"When we are together, we can offer our hands to the rest of mankind – all the religions, all the races, all the nations, all the civilizations – telling them we all belong to the same father in heaven."

Rabbi Lau made no reference to reports that he is a likely candidate for the next president of Israel. At least one other speaker alluded to them, but did not name the position explicitly.

In a brief, pre-dinner interview, during which he would accept no political questions, the rabbi discussed relationships between Jews and non-Jews, and those of Orthodox Jews with non-observant and non-Orthodox Jews.

Earlier, Rabbi Lau had told the guests at a VIP reception that the precept "Ve'ahavta l're'acha kamocha" ("You shall love your neighbour as yourself") is "the most important rule of ethics of Judaism."

Expanding on that thought, the rabbi – who continues to meet with Muslim leaders – told The CJN that Jews should "respect" non-Jews, but he cautioned against "involvement," explaining that intermarriages "threaten the very existence of the Jewish future.

"We, the Jewish people, have to follow the footsteps of our ancient fathers, and there is no conflict between us [and] the rest of the people in the world. Just the contrary, we have to find the bridge of moral and ethics which belong to all mankind and not to look for the differences."

To Jews who are "[still] secular," he said, "we open our hearts, we offer our hands, and we embrace all of them with the hope that they will come [to understand]… that knowledge of God will make full the world."

For non-Orthodox Jews – Conservative and Reform, in particular – the answer is "the same," he said. "We are open to everyone to continue the chain, and we have our laws as they are in Shulchan Aruch, the Jewish code. We are not permitted to change a law which was given by God at Mount Sinai 3,300 years ago."

Although the rabbi has been lauded for his longtime interfaith efforts with Muslim leaders, he said there has been little progress in building bridges.

"Unfortunately, the moderate leaders are too quiet and the fundamentalist leaders are too noisy, and I'm afraid the moderate, who are the real leaders, are a little bit hesitant – I'm speaking in very strict understatement… because of the noise of some fundamentalist spiritual leaders."

Among the politicians and dignitaries at the dinner were Israeli Consul General Ya'acov (Cobie) Brosh and Vaughan Mayor Michael di Biase, who told the crowd a building permit for the Beth Chabad Israeli Community Centre was "on its way." The community centre currently operates out of rented premises on Centre Street in Thornhill. Rabbi Eliezer Gurkow of London, Ont., was the MC, and Moshe Ronen, vice-president of the World Jewish Congress, introduced Rabbi Lau.

York Region shul receives Torah

By JENNA ROSMAN
CJN Intern

Or Hadash, the only synagogue in northern York Region, now has a second Torah scroll.

The Torah was donated by Arthur and Rayetta Solomon and their family. Arthur and Rayetta's son Donald and his family are members of the congregation.

"It is very important for the life of our congregation. To see a family donate a Torah to a small congregation is something that we don't see very often," said Cantor Martin Steinhouse, spiritual leader of the Reform congregation in Newmarket, Ont.

"There is a passage in the Shema that tells us that we have to teach the Torah to our children, so in essence we're to pass it down, from generation to generation. [The ceremony] was an example of grandparents passing the Torah down from them to their children, to their children's children, who we then hope, at some point, will pass down to their children the teachings of the Torah."

The Torah is estimated to be around 300 years old and was purchased from a congregation in Ontario that closed its doors "within the last five years," Steinhouse said.

The 13-year-old Or Hadash is affiliated with the Union of Reform Judaism and has a membership of 60 young families, 75 per cent of whom were at the dedication, Steinhouse said.

The celebration began at 9 a.m. May 28, at a park at Wayne and Howard drives.

"We paraded around Wayne and entered our area where we formed a big circle and danced with the Torah, singing wonderful songs. We then proceeded into the sanctuary and brought the Torah in, under the chupah," he said.

Steinhouse said the procession caught the attention of a Jewish couple shopping at a paint store nearby.

"They saw us walking into the parking lot [of the plaza where Or Hadash is located], and when they saw us and what we were doing, they decided to join us, which I thought was quite interesting," he said.

Steinhouse said having a second Torah scroll is important.

"There are times during the year when we read from more than one Torah," he said.

For example, at Simchat Torah, "we read from the end of the Torah and then we immediately begin Bereshit, the beginning of the Torah.

"And on Yom Kippur afternoon, we read Bereshit at the beginning of the Torah, but yet, in the morning service, we read from another part of the Torah."

York Region's Jewish population of about 60,000 includes Newmarket's 740 Jews, and Steinhouse said it's growing by leaps and bounds.

"Judaism doesn't just stop in Thornhill, Richmond Hill and the City of Toronto. Judaism is vibrant and it's really [thriving up north]," he said. "Our congregation is such that most families come to every event that we have, be it services or a social. Everyone knows everyone else. It is just a very warm and caring group of people. Everyone is made to feel welcome the minute they walk through the doors."

Or Hadash also has religious education classes for children from five years old to bar or bat mitzvah.

For more information on Or Hadash, visit the website at www.orhadash.org or call 905-898-2220.

CUPE's Sid Ryan obsessed with Israel

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The recent vote by the Ontario branch of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) to boycott Israel was met with a torrent of criticism in the media. Perhaps the strongest case against the CUPE decision – and against Sid Ryan, president of CUPE Ontario – was made by Michael Coren on his talk show Michael Coren Live (CTS, June 2.)

Coren, who actually considers Ryan a friend and regularly features him on his show, nailed the hapless CUPE Ontario boss time and again for both his ignorance of basic facts and his hypocrisy in singling out Israel for special censure.

In letters to both the Globe and Mail (June 2) and National Post (June 3), Ryan defended the boycott by arguing that Israel was in violation of UN Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338, which, according to him, require Israel to leave territories occupied since the 1967 war "immediately."

Ryan is utterly wrong. Resolutions 242 and 338 were passed in 1967, in recognition that Israel had fought a war of self-defence, and that any withdrawal from territories would occur only in the context of peace and security guarantees from Israel's Arab neighbours. This is what Israel has been trying to achieve since Camp David I (1978), which resulted in a peace treaty with Egypt in 1979. It later made peace with Jordan in 1994. Israel's negotiations with the Palestinians during the Oslo period (1993-2000) were subverted when then-Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat rejected Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak's and U.S. president Bill Clinton's offers of Palestinian statehood at Camp David II (summer 2000) and in the subsequent months.

The point is that Israel has long been involved in a process of achieving peace as stipulated by UN resolutions 242 and 338. That Ryan insists otherwise and that CUPE Ontario insists that Israel refuses "to recognize the Palestinian right to self-determination" reveal their abysmal ignorance of history.

On the Coren show, Ryan insisted that Israel was deliberately trying to oppress the Palestinians. Even more offensive were his attacks on "the [Jewish] lobby" for threatening CUPE Ontario staff.

"The Jewish lobby is quite rabid in terms of the comments they're making to my staff, threatening my staff, calling them racists, bigots," Ryan said.

When Coren challenged Ryan to explain who precisely he was referring to by the monolithic Jewish lobby, Ryan tried to sidestep the question, vowing that "this lobby will not push me one inch, not one inch."

Coren replied: "Look at what you've done… You've just said 'the Jewish lobby' is physically threatening your staff. That, I could argue, is actually quite a racist thing to say."

Coren was equally strong in criticizing Ryan's description of Israel as an "apartheid" state – a term favoured by those bent on delegitimizing Israel. Coren noted that there are Israeli Arabs who sit in the Knesset – and that, in fact, such MKs have been on Coren's show. Coren also stressed that, while they're not without grievances, Israeli Arabs enjoy full democratic rights and freedoms, including membership in labour unions. Indeed, he noted, they enjoy rights in Israel that they would not have under the Palestinian Authority or other Arab regimes.

None of this made the slightest impression on Ryan, who only wanted to talk about Israeli policies in the West Bank. And here again, he was back to the canard about the Jewish lobby: "If you listen to the [Jewish] lobby groups… they lead you to believe that somehow all Palestinians are terrorists."

For the record, the Canada-Israel Committee supports Palestinian rights, including the right of self-determination in a state of their own – depending, obviously, on the Palestinian leadership being truly committed to peacefully living alongside Israel as a Jewish state (which also means giving up their claim, which CUPE Ontario endorses, of a "right of return" to Israel – a prescription for Israel's destruction).

However, the Palestinian Authority is now governed by Hamas, which wants to eliminate Israel and rejects all previous agreements, including UN resolutions (such as 242) that call for peaceful reconciliation.

So why doesn't CUPE Ontario call for a boycott of the Palestinian Authority, or a boycott of China over Tibet, Russia over Chechnya, or Iran for saying that Israel should be "wiped off the map?"

Ryan is clearly obsessed with Israel and all its imagined faults. That became apparent in his irrational defence of CUPE Ontario's terribly misguided boycott, and in his utter refusal to be swayed even "one inch" by the facts.

Ryan responds to his critics

Ryan responded to his critics in a column in the Toronto Star, saying that the vote "to support an international campaign of boycott, divestment and sanctions against Israel has to be seen in the context of our union's overall policy in the Middle East and our history of union democracy and social justice."

The CUPE resolution was intended to "draw attention to [Palestinians'] inhumane suffering… through a peaceful form of protest against the policies of the state of Israel, which are clearly contrary to international law."

His Star column accused Israel of "debasement and dehumanization" of the Palestinians and said international sanctions and Israeli security restrictions were increasing Palestinian poverty and hunger.

He said construction of Israel's security wall – deemed illegal by the International Court of Justice – amounted to a unilateral creation of a border and a land grab, and he said expansion of "illegal settlements in the West Bank" violated UN resolutions.

"So, frustrated like so many millions who support a negotiated and just peace in the Middle East, CUPE members exercised their right to introduce policy resolutions to their Ontario division convention."

CUPE Ontario was supported by the Congress of South African Trade Unions (CSATU), an umbrella organization that represents 1.2 million workers. Its president, Wille Madisha, published a letter saying, "as someone who lived in apartheid in South Africa and who has visited Palestine, I say with confidence that Israel is an apartheid state.'"

גידי קורן וחברים

"אחרי עשרים ואחת שנות נישואין הציעה אשתי שאצא עם אשה אחרת לארוחת ערב וסרט... היא אמרה:"אני אוהבת אותך, אך אני יודעת שגם שהאשה הזאת אוהבת אותך וגם היא היתה רוצה לבלות איתך קצת זמן איכות". האשה שאשתי התכוונה אליה היתה אמי, שהתאלמנה לפני תשע עשרה שנה, אך לחץ העבודה ושלושת ילדנו גרמו לביקורים נדירים בלבד שלי אצלה.

Yiddish language needs a boost, say educators

By JENNA ROSMAN
CJN Intern

Interest in Yiddish education is dwindling and the 1,000-year-old language and culture is no longer widely esteemed.

That was the conclusion panellists at the closing panel of the Association for Canadian Jewish Studies' (ACJS) conference, The Futures of Yiddish Education and Culture in Canada, came to recently.

Yiddish was once the language of the masses and is now the language of a small minority of people, said Keith Weiser, professor of Jewish history at York University's School of Jewish Studies.

Weiser was speaking to an audience of about 100 people at York University on May 30.

He cited Hebrew University in Israel as the only university to still conduct Yiddish graduate programs in Yiddish. Columbia University no longer incorporates Yiddish interaction into its graduate program, said Weiser.

He noted that people "do not know a language until fully exposed and brought into the culture" and said one problem faced when learning Yiddish is, "Where you speak Yiddish, you speak English."

Weiser, who received his doctorate from Columbia University in 2001, said it's important to be "fully immersed" in the language of a people, rather than learning solely from a textbook.

"[At Columbia University] we were exposed to a wide range of Yiddish-speaking people," he said.

Weiser said eastern European Jewry was an "integral part of European history" and should be considered and studied as a civilization.

Marc Kates, Yiddish instructor at Bialik Hebrew Day School, the only Jewish school in Toronto to teach Yiddish, regrets that once his students enter high school, they will be unable to attain a full understanding of Yiddishkeit.

"I was once told math and science are at the top of the list [as being the most important subjects in school], while Yiddish was at the bottom," he said. "French was only a smidgen above Yiddish."

Kates said he feels as if he's in a "battle against naysayers of Yiddish," who do not deem Yiddish to be a legitimate subject for study.

Others featured on the panel included Janie Respitz Ben-Shach, president of the Jewish Public Library in Montreal, and Ethal Cooper, a Yiddish instructor and former director of the UJA Federation Committee for Yiddish.

Ben-Shach, who studied Yiddish at Hebrew University, said that while the Jewish Public Library in Montreal is no longer "steeped in Yiddish," as the Yiddish-speaking population ages, it's still a "top priority." She said that the library's five-times-a-year Yiddish Café nights have been successful in attracting the younger generation.

Ben-Shach has taught Yiddish to students at Montreal's Jewish Peoples Schools and Peretz Schools (JPPS) and said it's important to "immerse [youth] in the culture" in order for them to have a broader understanding of Yiddish.

Cooper said the UJA Committee for Yiddish has tried to establish a Yiddish theatre in Toronto, in order to play a role in the community and "foster" the language and culture, but so far "we have not been as successful as we would like to be."

"There is no support for Yiddish," said a woman who is a performer of klezmer and Yiddish music. "The only people to support are colleagues and acquaintances." She argued that in order for the Jewish population to have a sense of Yiddishkeit, they have to be "Jewish and proud."

"Our [Jewish] culture is so rich, it's world class," she said.

Following her, a member of the audience said there is a "disdain" for Jewish culture, and said it has to be made "hip" or "cool" to be appreciated.

"We must not deprive children of 1,000 years of Jewish history," he said.

Earlier that evening, Irving Abella, York University professor and author of six books, including the award-winning None Is Too Many, received the 2006 Canadian Jewish Studies Distinguished Service Award and a young klezmer group, Pomegranate, performed.

BBYO CONVENTION:
BBYO recently held its annual spring convention at Camp Northland. Dozens of Jewish teens from across Toronto gathered for a fun-filled weekend of athletic, social, and Jewish cultural programming, as well as a special farewell to graduating members. # Ahenakew's hate crime conviction thrown out

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A Saskatchewan judge has thrown out the hate crimes conviction of former native leader David Ahenakew and ordered a new trial.

Queen's Bench judge C.J. Laing overturned the conviction after finding the trial judge failed to adequately consider a defence contention that Ahenakew did not wilfully intend to promote the hatred of Jews.

Ahenakew was convicted in July 2005 by a Provincial Court judge based on statements he made to an assembly of native leaders in December 2002 and in comments he made shortly afterward to a reporter from Saskatoon's StarPhoenix newspaper. Ahenakew called Jews "a disease" and told the reporter "the Jews damn near owned all of Germany prior to the war. That's why Hitler came in, that he was gonna make damn sure that the Jews didn't take over Germany or Europe. That's why he fried six million of those guys."

Ahenakew appealed the conviction, with defence lawyer Doug Christie arguing Ahenakew's interview with the reporter was not intended as a public statement. He also contended the evidence showed Ahenakew's remarks did not show he had planned in advance to promote hate.

Laing found Ahenakew was an experienced public spokesman and would have known his remarks would be published.

But Laing concluded, "With respect to whether [Ahenakew] was 'wilfully' promoting hatred against people of the Jewish faith... the trial judge did not... consider all of the evidence surrounding the making of the statements."

Laing found the trial judge did not consider that some of Ahenakew's remarks were prompted by a request for an interview by the reporter, that the interview lasted around three minutes, that Ahenakew cut the interview short, that he hung up when the reporter called him later and that he twice said he did not want to continue talking about Jews.

Canadian Jewish Congress, which had intervened in the case to argue for the validity of Canada's anti-hate laws, said, "We respect the judicial process and have every confidence in the Crown to make appropriate choice as to whether or not it will appeal [the] decision, or proceed directly to a new trial."

Winnipeg shul celebrates 100th anniversary

By MYRON LOVE

WINNIPEG — On May 28, members and supporters of the Talmud Torah-Beth Jacob Synagogue sat down to a dinner celebrating the 100th anniversary of the founding of the Beth Jacob shul.

It was an evening of remembering, with the president of the north Winnipeg congregation, Percy Golubchuk, rereading the speech in Yiddish that he originally read as a youngster almost 40 years ago at the dedication of the opening of the second Beth Jacob building on Matheson Avenue. The shul moved there after the land on Schultz Street that the original synagogue stood on was expropriated by the city in 1966.

"I grew up at the Beth Jacob shul," recalled Golubchuk whose grandfather, Jacob Telpinsterin, was the shul's vice-president at the time of the dedication of the Matheson building.

Harold Buchwald, the evening's guest speaker, recalled that his grandfather, Max Buchwald, joined Beth Jacob when he moved from Winkler, Man., to Winnipeg in 1920. Max Buchwald remained a member of the shul until his death in 1934. His funeral was held at the synagogue.

"When I look around this room, I see the history and the memorabilia," Buchwald said. "It's exciting for those of us who appreciate living history."

He cited as an example a memorial stone at the front of the synagogue with the inscribed names of the members of the board of directors of the Winnipeg Hebrew Free School circa 1920.

The congregation moved into its present building – a converted former movie theatre on Main Street – in 1998 after the community sold the old building, which also housed the Talmud Torah School and Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate. The two schools were moved to the new Asper Jewish Community Campus in south Winnipeg, where they became part of Gray Academy.

The synagogue members were able to take the shul's stained glass windows with them and install them inside the new building, along with the stone plaques from the original synagogue.

Buchwald's talk related to the founding of the Beth Jacob, and he compared them to three individuals – Theodor Herzl, Chaim Weizman and Eddy Jacobson (U.S. president Harry Truman's Jewish former business partner) – who were instrumental in the founding of the State of Israel.

They were individuals who were "the right persons, in the right place, at the right time," he said.

Operation Last Chance launched in Canada

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In the 20 years since Justice Jules Deschenes urged legal action against Nazi war criminals living in Canada, the federal government has managed to remove only a handful of perpetrators.

Three war criminals have left the country voluntarily or were deported since the current war crimes program was initiated in 1995. In all, Canada has brought 21 cases before the courts – the last, about two years ago. Eight have lost their citizenship.

Last week, Nazi hunter Efraim Zuroff was in Ottawa to announce the launch of Operation Last Chance, a program of the Simon Wiesenthal Center that was initiated four years ago to spur investigations and prosecutions of Nazi suspects in nations that had been ignoring the issue.

With perpetrators aging, it's time to introduce the program to Canada in the hope it will uncover onetime Nazi collaborators who should be brought to justice, Zuroff said.

Under the program, the Center will open a special hotline to take leads and will offer $10,000 (US) for information that facilitates prosecution and punishment of each Nazi war criminal, Zuroff said.

Operation Last Chance was introduced in Canada because "efforts [here] are so poor," he said.

Employing a soccer metaphor, Zuroff said, "We're now in injury time. It's now or never."

Operation Last Chance was launched at a rally on Parliament Hill on June 6 – the 62nd anniversary of the D-Day landings.

Addressing the gathering, Israeli Ambassador Alan Baker said, "The theme of this rally is to call upon Canada, as well as other countries in the world, to do whatever is necessary to apprehend and bring to justice some of the remaining 10,000 Nazi war criminals that are still alive, and at large, throughout the world.

"In an international community and society that over the past few years, having learned the lessons of the Second World War, Yugoslavia and Rwanda, has done so much to bring an end to the impunity of international war criminals – especially with the creation of an international criminal court headed by Canada – we must all, first and foremost, do whatever is possible to root out those criminals, however old they may be and however long they have been hiding in Canada and elsewhere among small communities."

Joining Baker as honourary chair of the event were MPs Irwin Cotler, Mac Harb and Susan Kadis; former NDP leader Ed Broadbent; Minister of Public Safety Stockwell Day; Turkish Ambassador Aydemir Erman; and Polish Ambassador Piotr Ogrodzinski.

The Center's Sixth Annual Report on the Worldwide Investigation and Prosecution of Nazi War Criminals, released recently, gave Canada a grade of C.

"Believe me, that's being overly generous," Zuroff said. "I could easily have given Canada an F."

The only factor preventing a failing grade is the existence of a government office that is ostensibly addressing the presence in Canada of Nazi perpetrators. Canada's legal processes must be "streamlined" to be effective, but there appears an absence of "political will" to address the issue, he said.

"That's the only explanation for this," Zuroff continued, noting the United States has a similar suspects profile and also employs civil remedies to remove them, but it has won more than 100 cases, deporting 54 people.

"The passage of time does not diminish the guilt of the perpetrators." If governments place a statute of limitations on prosecutions, "It's like saying you can get away with genocide," he added.

Terry Beitner, director and general counsel of the Department of Justice's war crimes unit, defended the current program. "We're bringing forward the matters with the best possible speed in light of the circumstances and the facts in each case," he said.

"We receive new allegations all the time. These files have not gotten easier. If anything, with the passage of time, it's more difficult to work up these files."

Beitner said suspects uncovered by Operation Last Chance would be evaluated in the same way as other suspects.

Around the world, the year spanning "April 1, 2005 to March 31, 2006, has seen a dramatic increase of 320 per cent in the number of convictions of Nazi war criminals," the Center's report stated. Most of that is attributable to successful prosecutions in the United States (28) and Italy.

"Italy has begun an energetic campaign and they convicted [in absentia] 10 Germans for their roles against civilians," Zuroff said.

Since its introduction, Operation Last Chance has uncovered several high-profile suspects.

Zuroff said the Center is calling on Hungarian survivors with information about mistreatment and persecution of Jews in Budapest from Oct. 15, 1944, to Dec. 25, 1944 – the period corresponding to Lajos Polgar's stint as head of the Hungarian Arrow Cross, the Hungarian fascist party. Anyone with information is asked to contact Zuroff in Israel at 011-972-2-563-1273/4/5, or the Center's Toronto office at 416-864-9735.

Sleep Apnea? Can't Use CPAP? Know Someone Who Snores?

Oral Appliance Therapy is a proven alternative recommended by the American Academy of Sleep Medicine

If you or someone close to you suffers from snoring, an oral appliance is recommended by the American Academy of Sleep Medicine.

Current guidelines (revised Feb. '06) now indicate that oral appliance therapy is appropriate for mild and moderate sleep apnea and is endorsed as a secondary treatment for severe apnea, when CPAP is not an option.

Dr. Les Priemer, a Toronto dentist has been educating and treating patients for over 11 years on the alternative of appliance therapy for people with snoring and sleep apnea. "Many patients are glad to have an alternative to CPAP" he says. "This success makes my work very satisfying."

Several months ago, Dr. Priemer's practice embarked on a consumer education campaign to inform the public about oral appliance therapy. "Public awareness plays a very important role in choosing the correct therapy for these conditions."

CPAP remains the gold standard of care, especially for severe sleep apnea, but for those who can't tolerate the machine, oral appliance therapy is a recognized alternative.

"We continue to receive calls every day from people who have read our brochure, seen our advertising, been referred by a health professional or who are looking for an alternative to a CPAP machine. Family members have even encouraged their loved ones to seek treatment as this affects them as well." says Priemer.

"Everyone knows somebody who is using CPAP or is struggling with these conditions and has not gone for any consultation or treatment at all."

An oral appliance is recommended for someone with mild to moderate or even severe OSA (obstructive sleep apnea) and who prefers it to CPAP, cannot or won't use CPAP.

Oral Appliances may also help snoring patients who do not respond to behaviour changes such as weight loss or shifting their sleep position.

A custom-made oral appliance is generally easy and comfortable to wear. During sleep, it maintains an unobstructed airway, repositioning the lower jaw, tongue and soft palate. Because of its compact size, it allows easy travel, unlike the larger and cumbersome CPAP machine. The appliance can also be designed to be worn by people with constricted nasal passages.

Endorsements stream in from patients whose quality of life has been changed with oral appliance therapy. "They're so happy with their appliance" says Priemer.

Joanne, wife of patient Stephen Bishop writes: "We can't believe the difference! (My husband) never really believed that his snoring was as bad as I said, until a couple of years ago, he went on a boys' ski vacation and his buddies couldn't even believe the noise levels. We've tried breath right strips, different pillows, even herbal inhalants; he's seen an ear/nose specialist. I've spent the last 4 years poking, pushing and getting him to roll over so the snoring would stop momentarily. A snoring husband is one of the top reasons women can't sleep.

You need to tell both your patients and your community about this appliance and its wonders – it really helps."

Patient Pauline Hogarth writes: On total evaluation the positive success of the appliance far outweighs any discomfort I may feel from wearing it and it's with much gratitude to Dr. Priemer that I'm able to continue living days with energy rather than a feeling of tiredness and irritability.

Constantia Retirement Residence: very Jewish and "right on campus"

You're not a kvetcher; you don't ask for much. Your needs are simple; it's life that is complicated.

After years of avoiding the dreaded "R" word, you've finally agreed to consider the possibility of moving into a retirement home. Having made that concession, you have only one simple request.

No need to schlep, every reason to stay

That you can do so without actually leaving your own home.

Impossible? Maybe once; not now. Enter Constantia Retirement Residence, a place so close to home — and so much like home — that it is home.

Pronounced Con-stan-cha and named after a picturesque area near Cape Town, South Africa, this new facility has the advantages that other Jewish-lifestyle retirement homes offer and one they don't: location in the epicentre of the Jewish community.

By "epicentre", we don't just mean "near the centre"; we mean that if you yell loud enough, your children or grandchildren will hear you. Though with the manifold pleasures of living at Constantia, chances are the only yelling you'll do is to celebrate your arrival there.

In practical terms, says Marketing Manger Reesa Soto, "for most of our residents, living at Bathurst and Centre means living within five kilometres of at least one family member."

It means your children and grandchildren won't have to schlep to visit you. It also means they won't have an excuse for not visiting. Oi! And the ample and immediately accessible onsite free parking means they'll have no reason to "love you and leave you."

Designed and built with a view to serving the needs of the GTA's Jewish community both today and in the future, Constantia is owned and operated by Chartwell Seniors Housing REIT, Canada's leading builder and administrator of retirement residences. Chartwell's preeminence in the field stems not merely from its size, but from the ethos of caring that starts at the very top and emanates through the ranks. Says Chartwell Vice Chair and President Stephen Suske, "My commitment since entering this business has been to ensure that all of our facilities would be good enough for my Mother." (His Mother did, in fact, live in a Chartwell residence in her later years).

Echoing these sentiments, Soto and fellow Marketing Managers Beth Bokser and Elaine Ross demonstrate a commitment to caring and a passion for personal service that goes far beyond any marketing slogan. These are people who don't just talk tachles, they live it. "This isn't just a job, it's a pleasure," says Bokser. "When residents thank us, we feel guilty...it's we who should be thanking them for the privilege of helping them."

As Chartwell's newest residence, Constantia boasts the kind of amenities that will fulfill the most ambitious wish list. What does Constantia offer? What doesn't it offer? All the state-of-the-art features you'd expect plus a few you wouldn't, like a wireless pendant for each resident to ensure 24-hour emergency communication.

Constantia is equally attractive inside and out. The beautifully landscaped grounds are connected by a walking path that encircles the building. The indoor common areas include comfortable lounges, an activity centre, a greenhouse, a library, billiards and games rooms, a spa, a fitness centre, a beauty salon, laundry rooms on each level, and not one but two massive-screen theatres that would be the envy of the MGM Grand. (You've heard of Hollywood North but haven't actually seen it? It's here).

Jewish environment provides seamless transition

Residents can choose from a selection of impeccable studio, one-bedroom and two-bedroom suites, each featuring individual climate control and fresh air supply, ensuite bathroom with step-in shower, and kitchenette.

How Jewish is Constantia? Jewish enough that fully 100% of the residents who have moved in to date are Jewish.

Jewish enough that in addition to the usual mainstream activities like lectures, computer classes, tea socials, daily fitness and shopping excursions, Constantia's activity calendar reads like that of a shul group. From challah baking to Yiddish class (Yiddish class?? Are you learning it or teaching it??) to a Kabbalat shabbat service led by Cantor Ron Graner, to Jewish holiday observances, Constantia's Jewish environment provides a seamless transition from your current lifestyle.

Marketing Mgr. Elaine Ross

Last but not least, Jewish enough that kibbitzing is always in evidence at the dinner table, at tea, in the lounges, in the hallways, in the beauty salon, in the theatre rooms ... in short, wherever residents congregate.

Spend even a few minutes at Constantia, and you'll see the residents exhibit a joie-de-vivre that will redefine your notions of retirement living. Constantia isn't just a comfortable and pleasant place, it's a fun place.

For a retirement residence, that isn't just an achievement — it's a blessing.

Website monitors swastika, gang and anti-police graffiti

By ABIGAIL CUKIER
Special to the CJN

HAMILTON — Hamilton resident Nathan Berman runs a website to show friends and family members the sights of his city.

While the photos are of parks and buildings, he is not boasting about them.

Berman's website Hate in Hamilton monitors swastika, gang and anti-police graffiti in the city's public places.

"I go along the Escarpment Rail Trail every nice day and looking at [the swastikas there] is like being hit in the stomach," he said.

"My friends and family come here and they say, 'You should leave.' They're nervous about taking a walk."

So for more than a year, Berman has maintained members.porchlight.ca/nberman/swastikas.htm.

Last July, he reviewed the locations with police, who he says have been diligent in having the swastikas removed. He reports on swastika clean-up on his website.

Swastikas are a threat not only to Jews but to homosexuals, as well, he says. "It's a death threat. I live here, I walk outside."

According to the Hamilton Police Service Hate Crime Unit 2005 Statistical Report, there were 25 swastikas reported in the city that year and eight were found to be hate motivated.

In 2004, the public reported 28 swastikas.

Sgt. Steve Hahn of the Hamilton Hate Crime Unit says he knows graffiti is underreported, which makes statistics hard to keep. He also said rates can fluctuate, with graffiti increasing in the wake of a related national or newsworthy event. Hahn says that for graffiti to be considered a hate crime, there must be evidence it was motivated solely, or in part, by bias or prejudice based on race, religion, ethnicity, sexual orientation, disability, age or gender.

Swastikas were found in parks, at schools and in other areas in Hamilton. Police found no discernible pattern and a large portion of the sites had other unrelated grafitti.

"A swastika on the sidewalk is tantamount to hate. It's an offence, but it's not a hate crime," Hahn says. "It hurts, it hurts bad, but it's not a hate crime."

Len Rudner, national director of community relations for the Canadian Jewish Congress, says a swastika on a synagogue or a mosque is clearly an act of hate but on a newspaper box it's not necessarily.

"It's certainly more difficult to prove hate per the terms of the Criminal Code of Canada. Now if Elie Wiesel were on the cover of the paper that day, you could say it was hate. So the police have to be cognizant of context."

Part of the hate crime unit's mandate is to educate the public at schools or places of worship.

"Graffiti hurts everyone. I think education can resonate with those people who might have thought of committing a hate crime," Hahn said. "But we have a long way to go.

"Where does hate begin? It starts around the dinner table. We have to nip it in the bud there and then.

"We will never be able to eradicate it. There will always be intolerance."

Rudner says it's important the public sees the police responding to vandalism.

He points out that in London, England, employees remove graffiti regularly, because they found if they did not, it multiplied.

"The message [of hate graffiti] is, you are not welcome here, you are in danger here, you are not like the rest of us and get out," he said.

"[Hate] graffiti is corrosive to civil society. It's the antithesis of free speech. Free speech brings us together, hate speech drives us apart."

In 2005, the Hamilton Hate Crimes Unit received 113 reports of incidents including graffiti, compared to 124 in 2004. Of these, 39 were classified as hate crimes. This was a 35 per cent drop compared to 2004, when 60 hate crimes were reported.

Fifty-nine per cent of incidents involved race, while 10 per cent were motivated by religion.

Palestinians may have caused Gaza beach deaths, Olmert says

BY HERB KEINON
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Both Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Defence Minister Amir Peretz indicated Sunday that Friday's blast on a Gaza Strip beach that killed seven civilians may have been caused by the Palestinians and not the Israel Defence Forces.

Peretz told the weekly cabinet meeting that he had established an investigative committee, headed by a major-general, that was to present its findings this week.

Peretz said the panel's preliminary findings showed the Ghalia family was not killed by a shell fired by IDF ground forces or by the Israeli Air Force. Peretz said that one of six artillery shells fired by the IDF was unaccounted for, but that there was a gap between when the shells were fired and the time the Palestinians said the shells landed.

Senior officers said Sunday that they had received new information indicating the blast was caused by an "internal Palestinian incident" and was not related to Israeli artillery fire.

A Palestinian bomb planted on the beach or a Qassam rocket that went astray, senior officers said, might have been the cause of the explosion. The officers said Navy and IAF fire had been ruled out, and while the landing spot of one of six artillery shells fired close to the time of the incident had yet to be found, it was unlikely to have caused the blast.

The IDF said the timeline of the incident and the artillery fire did not match. In addition, the closest any one of the six shells landed to the beach was 200 to 250 metres away, while a shell usually only strays from its target a maximum of 30 metres.

Maj.-Gen. Yoav Galant said the army had proof its cannons were not responsible for the blast, since IDF fire was suspended 15 minutes before the explosion on the beach. But other officers spoke more cautiously, saying it was still too early to vindicate Israel in the deaths of the innocent Palestinians.

Hamas operatives arrived at the scene of the blast moments after the explosion and were spotted collecting shrapnel, the army said. "It might be that they were trying to conceal evidence that would have put the blame on them," an IDF source explained.

At the cabinet meeting Peretz told the ministers that some 40 Qassam rockets were fired at Sderot and nearby communities over the weekend, and that Nati Angel – the Sderot man seriously wounded by a Qassam Sunday morning at a school near the city – was a "personal friend." Peretz lives in Sderot, where he used to be mayor.

"We will work to protect our citizens, and the IDF is prepared to operate against all the [terrorist] organizations," he said. Peretz also told the cabinet that in the 24 hours ending Sunday, Hamas had openly fired rockets at Israel, and that starting a few days earlier, Hamas had become involved in the firing of rockets, both directly and indirectly.

"I stress in the clearest way possible that we will act against all those engaged in terrorism, including Hamas, with all the means at our disposal," Peretz said.

Olmert opened the cabinet meeting by expressing Israel's "deep regret" over the beach incident and saying that Peretz had set up an investigation. "Of course the exact details and the conclusions of the inquiry will be made public," he said.

Olmert, who stressed he was not apologizing because the facts were not yet clear, said past experience had shown that myths could be created that were divorced from the facts.

He was referring to Muhammad al-Dura, the 12-year-old Palestinian boy killed during an exchange of fire between the IDF and Palestinians in September 2000. Images of Dura hiding behind his father and then being shot and killed were beamed across the world, with Israel widely blamed for his death until researchers three years later brought ballistic evidence that the shots could not have been fired by IDF soldiers.

Regarding the Gaza beach incident, Olmert said it must be made clear that Qassam rockets, designed to maim and kill Israelis, have been fired from Gaza continuously over the past few weeks.

"This firing is very serious," he said. "It strikes at the fabric of life in communities in southern Israel and threatens peoples' lives… This is an unending series of terrorist attacks designed to strike at civilians."

Olmert also strenuously defended the IDF's actions. "I reject outright any and all attempts to impugn the army's morality. The IDF is the most moral military in the world. There has never been – and there isn't now – a policy of attacking civilians. I support the IDF commanders and soldiers who are working to halt the attacks on Israeli citizens in the southern part of the country."

He added: "At the same time, we will continue to act with full force against the firing of Qassam rockets and we will not refrain from operations that could thwart rocket firings, anywhere and in any situation, as necessary."

Hamas likely to increase violence, expert says

By YOAV APPEL
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Hamas will find it difficult not to resume attacks on Israeli targets given the current circumstances, says Ephraim Inbar, head of Bar-Ilan University's Begin-Sadat Center for Strategic Studies.

After a 16-month self-imposed cease-fire, Hamas' stature has been weakened while other Palestinian terrorist groups have carried out attacks, increasing their popularity, Inbar told the Jerusalem Post Sunday.

But recent events have helped Hamas by turning public attention away from Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' controversial call for a referendum on the "prisoners' document" that called for a Palestinian state within Gaza and the West Bank, and from increasing violence between Hamas and Abbas' Fatah party.

But Hamas faces a dilemma as it struggles to pay government workers' wages and gain international legitimacy in the eyes of western countries, while its grassroots domestic supporters find "a battle against Israel popular," Inbar said.

"[Hamas] wants respect," Inbar said, "but what it really needs is money."

The latest onslaught of Qassam rocket attacks from inside the Palestinian territories is likely to lead to an Israeli military escalation, Inbar said, adding that more Israel Defence Forces ground operations inside the Gaza Strip would be inevitable. One scenario would see Israeli forces regain control of former Israeli settlement areas that abut Gaza's northern boundaries and are currently being used as Qassam rocket-launching areas.

Ely Karmon, a senior researcher with the Institute for Counter-Terrorism in Herzliya agrees that Hamas' threat to renew attacks within Israel must be taken seriously.

Hamas has set a precedent by following through on similar threats in the past, he said, referring to a spate of suicide bombings that followed Israel's killing of the group's key bomb-maker, Yehiya Ayyash, in 1996.

And while Hamas' actions are certainly aimed at sabotaging Abbas' attempt to obtain a consensus through the referendum, the group is also influenced by larger regional players such as Iran and Syria, where Khaled Maashal, the Hamas leader-in-exile is located.

But with no inclination to be forced into a compromise with Fatah or to work toward a comprehensive peace deal while avoiding an internal Palestinian civil war, the group's only option is to turn to armed conflict with Israel, Karmon said.

In Hamas' current position, a military escalation with Israel would not be in the group's interest, however, and a large Israeli ground operation in the Gaza Strip, while costly to both sides, would be devastating to Hamas, he said.

Nevertheless, Hillel Frisch of the Begin-Sadat Center argued that a return to previous levels of violence is not inevitable, and Hamas, under pressure from both Israel and Fatah, may opt to maintain its harsh rhetoric and inaccurate Qassam rocket fire but avoid an overall escalation.

"They'll buckle under an Israeli and Fatah onslaught," Frisch said, and Hamas can't afford Israeli attacks on its leaders, many of whom now hold ministerial positions in the Palestinian government.

However, while some experts argue that the group may have used its "time-out" to further amass arms and explosives, Frisch said Egyptian authorities have cracked down on smuggling routes into the Gaza Strip recently, as Egypt has become more wary of Palestinian military capability.

Canada-Israel prostitution ring alleged

CJN News Services

JERUSALEM — Police in Israel say they have uncovered a prostitution ring that may have included trafficking Russian-speaking Israeli women to Canada. Three arrests were made last week in the case.

Tel Aviv police became suspicious when they noticed ads in Russian newspapers offering women up to $10,000 (US) a month for work as escorts in Canada. Police allege the women were sent to Canada as part of an international network that is active in Russia, Israel, Canada and the United States.

The alleged ring recruited dozens of young women who were subjected to degrading interviews and nude photographs. Some were sent against their will, said Israeli police spokesperson Micky Rosenfeld.

Insp. Glenn Hanna of the RCMP said in Toronto there would be no charges of human trafficking. The UN definition of the offence requires that the victims be coerced, while it appears the women sent to Canada were not forced and came knowing what was expected of them. He said the cases have been turned over to Toronto police for investigation.

Announcement of the Israeli ring came the same day the U.S. State Department issued a report on human trafficking that blamed Israel for not doing enough to stop the practice.

Rosenfeld said Israel had stepped up its efforts to stop human trafficking. "There is a decline [in Israel] in the numbers of those who are involved and dealing today with the buying and selling of women," he said.

Argentine court to study bombing coverup

By JOE GOLDMAN
JTA

BUENOS AIRES — An Argentine court is studying a possible coverup in the investigation of the 1994 bombing of an Argentine Jewish centre that killed 85 people.

This week, the court began inspecting the events following the July 18, 1994, bombing at the AMIA Jewish social service building in Buenos Aires.

That attack, and the March 1992 bombing of the Israeli Embassy in Buenos Aires, which killed 29 people, remain unsolved.

The main AMIA court investigation ended almost two years ago with the entire case being thrown out by a special tribunal that had spent three years hearing the evidence. This trial was reportedly the longest and costliest in Argentina's history.

A few weeks ago, an appeals court upheld that decision and opened up a judicial process to investigate the original failed investigation of the AMIA bombing.

Now a federal court will begin to try to unravel the mystery of whether there was a coverup after the bombing – and whether it reached into the highest levels of the government of former president Carlos Menem.

Among those who were ordered to testify in this new proceeding are an ex-federal judge, Juan Jose Galeano; two of the original prosecutors; the former chief of the Argentine intelligence service and two of his top assistants; and Ruben Beraja, then president of the main Jewish political organization, DAIA.

Court officials will not rule out possible interrogations for Menem and two or three of his top ministers.

The questioning is expected to centre on why Galeano apparently paid a suspect $400,000 – from intelligence service coffers, whose expenditures must be approved by the president – to change his testimony and finger other defendants, why evidence went missing or was altered and why films of interrogations were burned with the knowledge of the judge, the prosecutors and some lawyers involved in the case.

Will not rule out interrogations of Menem

Galeano was forced to resign from his court post earlier this year in the face of an impeachment trial concerning these charges.

Pablo Jacoby, the lawyer for Memoria Activa, one of three organizations representing families of the victims, said this new investigation "could prove to be very important if in the testimony we can find out who gave the orders to point the case toward a specific theory. We now know that the central focus of that original investigation was a setup," he said, referring to the fingering of a group of Buenos Aires provincial police officers.

While underscoring the importance of this secondary investigation, Jacoby said there are still hopes for advances in the central investigation, now under a new prosecutor, and reiterated that Memoria Activa plans to go ahead with its presentation before the Inter-American Court of Human Rights in Washington in October.

"Some basic questions remain unanswered in this case and we will bring those to the court. For example, why did the government have no contingency plan for disasters, why are the intelligence service files on the AMIA case not open to public scrutiny, how could public funds be utilized to pay off witnesses without public knowledge and a number of other matters," Jacoby said.

A spokesperson for AMIA called the new court investigations "coherent" and said the next logical step would be calling Menem and former interior minister Carlos Corach to give testimony in the case.

However, a DAIA spokesperson complained publicly that the new investigation is not addressing the most important question of who bombed the AMIA building.

Russia urges Israel not to attack Iran

By HERB KEINON
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Russia sent messages to Israel through U.S. intermediaries recently, voicing opposition to a possible military attack on Iran's nuclear facilities, the Jerusalem Post has learned.

While Israel and Russia have good relations and a direct line of communications, the Russians chose to use the United States to deliver this message of military restraint out of a belief that Jerusalem pays closer attention to messages from Washington.

According to assessments reaching Jerusalem, while the Russians don't want to see Iran get the bomb, they believe this may still be a decade away and that in the meantime diplomatic efforts might succeed in keeping Tehran from reaching that point.

Moscow is concerned any military conflagration would eventually spill over the Russian-Iranian border into the Caucasus, central Asia and even Chechnya, and be detrimental to Russian interests.

Washington, according to these assessments, does not believe that Russian opposition to United Nations Security Council sanctions against Iran is motivated by anti-American sentiment, but rather by the belief that a military action in Iran would severely destabilize the region.

The Russian concern, according to these assessments, is that UN sanctions would be the start of a "slippery slope" leading inevitably to military action, just as was the case with Iraq.

One source of Washington and Moscow's different tactical approaches toward Iran stems from different assessments regarding when Iran may "go online." While Washington is closer to Israel's position that the point of no return is when the Iranians have mastered the technology to create a bomb, for the Russians "D-Day" is when the Iranians have actually built a bomb.

Since the Russians believe this may be some five to 10 years down the line, they feel there is more time to exhaust the diplomatic approach. Despite this, the Russians, according to recent assessments, were taken by surprise at the pace of the Iranian nuclear program, and did not believe they were as far along as is apparently the case.

According to assessments reaching Jerusalem from Washington, the United States has no intention of either allowing Tehran to enrich uranium on Iranian soil or to assist it in building civilian nuclear capabilities. These assessments contradict press reports this week claiming that the diplomatic package presented to Iran last week and supported by the United States leaves open the possibility in the distant future that Tehran would be able to enrich uranium on its own soil.

According to a Washington Post report, this concession – along with a U.S. promise of aid for Iran's civilian nuclear energy program – would be conditioned on Iran suspending its nuclear work until the International Atomic Energy Agency determined that the program was peaceful. In addition, Iran would also need to convince the UN Security Council that it was not seeking a nuclear weapon, a process that administration officials were quoted this week as saying could take as long as 30 years.

But according to the assessments reaching Jerusalem, Washington has no interest in letting Iran enrich any quantity of uranium, because even the enrichment of a small amount would necessitate research and development that could eventually allow Tehran to master the technology needed to create nuclear weapons.

These assessments say that it would also be extremely far-fetched to imagine the United States assisting an Iranian civilian nuclear program. The United States remains in favour of a Russian proposal of a joint Iranian-Russian venture in which Russia would enrich the uranium on its own soil on Iran's behalf. This is a model that could be adopted elsewhere as well, as rising energy prices are expected to propel other countries into the development of nuclear energy.

Israeli budget passed

Israel passed its 2006 state budget. The $61 billion (US) package was approved by the Knesset after a six-month delay. The 35-22 vote was a coup for Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, who has been facing growing opposition from his biggest partner in the coalition government, the Labor Party. The budget increases spending in almost all areas of the civil service, with the notable exception of the Defence Ministry, which had its funding cut by 1.1 per cent.

Sweden labels Golan wine

Sweden is labelling Israeli wines produced in the Golan Heights as coming from an occupied territory. The wines will be labelled by the country's alcohol monopoly as being made in "Syrian-occupied territory," Yediot Achronot reported. The CEO of the Golan Heights Winery blasted the move. "We will continue to sell the wines with the Golan Heights label because this is where the wines comes from," Shalom Blayer said. "Whoever doesn't like it can refrain from buying the wine."

PMO spokesperson resigns

A veteran spokesperson for the Israeli government has stepped down. Ra'anan Gissin, who was frequently the face of Israel on television, where he often sparred with pro-Palestinian pundits, ended his tenure with the Prime Minister's Office last week. A successor was not immediately named. Gissin was close to former prime minister Ariel Sharon.

Parkinson med approved

The U.S. Food and Drug Administration recently approved a drug developed in Israel to treat Parkinson's disease, a neurodegenerative brain disorder. Azilect, which is now available to patients, is the first Parkinson's medication with a once-daily dosage. Professors at the Technion-Israel Institute of Technology in Haifa worked with the Israeli pharmaceutical firm Teva on the drug.

Israel treats Palestinians

Israel is paying for the medical treatment of a Palestinian girl wounded during an Israeli air strike in Gaza. Maria Aman, 3, suffered serious injuries in a missile attack last month on a Palestinian terrorist in Gaza, and has been receiving treatment in Israel's Sheba Hospital ever since. Three of her relatives were killed in the strike. Defence Minister Amir Peretz said the government would underwrite her treatment after it emerged that further funding was unavailable. The Peres Peace Center has also offered to help pay for Aman to remain under long-term Israeli care, which will likely be received at Jerusalem's Alyn Pediatric Hospital. One of her uncles was wounded in the Israeli strike and is also receiving treatment in Israel.

Counterattacks to increase

Defence Minister Amir Peretz ordered the Israel Defence Forces to step up the targeted killings of Palestinians involved in Qassam rocket attacks on Israel, just hours after three rockets struck the western Negev last Thursday. One woman was treated for shock after a rocket landed at the entrance to Kibbutz Gevim. Another landed near a factory in Sderot. No injuries or damage was reported.

Olmert off to Europe

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert is on his first official European tour. Olmert set off Sunday for London, where he was to meet British Prime Minister Tony Blair. On Tuesday, he was to continue to Paris for talks with French leaders. Olmert is expected to try to muster support for his West Bank withdrawal plan and press European leaders to maintain a tough line against Iran's nuclear program. His visit also coincides with European Union discussions on a new proposed mechanism for funnelling money to Palestinian Authority civil servants who have gone unpaid since the West imposed an aid embargo on the Hamas government.

Boycott condemned as McCarthyism

"We believe that such academic boycotts are counterproductive and retrograde. Far more can be obtained through dialogue and academic co-operation," he said.

The boycott motion approved by NATFHE was only effective for three days due to a merger between NATFHE and the Association of University Teachers, a smaller union, which took place earlier this month. NATFHE had indicated that the new body would not be bound by the decision.

Last year, the Association of University Teachers (AUT) voted to boycott Haifa and Bar-Ilan universities, charging them with complicity in Israel's "suppression of the Palestinians." The council of the association reversed the decision after objections by leading scholars and academic organizations.

Following NATFHE's boycott vote, University of Haifa president Aaron Ben-Ze'ev said the university strongly condemned the boycott decision.

"Any attempt to connect politics and academic research is pure McCarthyism," Ben-Ze'ev said. "The university will continue working in collaboration with its colleagues in Israel, Britain and elsewhere, in order to protect the principle of academic freedom," he said.

Gerald Steinberg, director of the interdisciplinary program on conflict management and negotiation at Bar Ilan University and a member of the IAB executive committee, added that "such political actions... destroy the academic process since we will no longer be able to trust the objectivity and professional detachment of academics who are involved in 'silent boycotts,' the journals they edit, and the peer review processes in which they participate."

IDF said inept dealing with foreign press

managed to win over the local press. Rather, this highlights the fact that the army's PR wing is directed mainly toward public opinion in Israel.

By contrast, the total failure of the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) to counter the Palestinian propaganda campaign in the foreign press that began immediately after seven members of one family were killed at a Gaza beach last Friday proves that after so many years of media warfare, the military still prefers to rely on the Foreign Ministry when it comes to the international media.

The IDF spokesperson's unit has officers who are fluent in a wide range of languages and responsible for contact with the hundreds of foreign reporters working in Israel, but the higher command of the unit doesn't seem to see such contact as crucial.

The photographs flashing on TV screens around the world of 12-year-old Huda Ghalia searching frantically for her parents in the sand after the explosion on the beach, only to find their bodies, caught the army by surprise. It took 24 hours before official Israeli sources began saying, at first almost apologetically, that there was a possibility that the explosive that had torn apart the Ghalia family might not have come from an IDF artillery shell but from a Palestinian device instead.

By then, of course, it was too late. The images of Huda, expressing better than any words the extent of Israeli "brutality," had already transformed the Palestinian version of the events into incontrovertible fact. Whatever Israeli spokespeople were saying at that point seemed like a lame attempt at covering up.

There is no excuse for this delayed reaction. The IDF employs advanced reconnaissance and radar equipment around and over the northern Gaza Strip. Land, air and sea-based devices constantly monitor and record activity there, and unmanned aerial vehicles (UAV) continually hover above – even more so when the army is attacking a certain area. So if six artillery shells were fired in the vicinity of the beach at about the time the family was blown up, there must be footage, perhaps from a number of angles.

The IDF knew there were Hamas members doing something suspicious on that beach almost immediately. It had the pictures to prove that they were tampering with evidence. The army also had no conclusive proof that it was indeed a stray shell that had caused the carnage. The obvious thing would have been to release the footage as soon as possible to the foreign press. It might not have convinced anyone outright, but it might have been enough to cast a serious degree of doubt on the Palestinian narrative, enough to hold the fort until a more exhaustive investigation had been carried out.

Even if the results had then shown that it was an Israeli shell that hit the family, the IDF would still have come out as more honest and humane. But after the military was so slow on the uptake, the fact that the evidence now seems to be pointing at the Palestinians seems almost useless.

The IDF spokesperson's unit has soldiers stationed within the advance command posts from which the battles against the Qassam missiles are being directed. They should have been busy feeding headquarters in Tel Aviv with the relevant information. The officers in Tel Aviv should have been demanding it of their own accord, but as one officer in the unit said on Sunday, "No one was even thinking along those lines. It's just not part of their consciousness, and that's why we lost the golden opportunity during the first few hours."

The IDF has proven inept in the past at dealing with the foreign press. It took months before the army put out an official version of the death of 12-year-old Palestinian Muhammad al-Dura, proving he had been killed by Palestinian gunfire. By then, he had become an international icon for Israel's cruelty towards children.

A couple of years ago, the IDF tried to use footage taken from a UAV of terrorists using a United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine ambulance to ship Qassam rockets, only to fall flat on its face when it was actually a stretcher being loaded into the ambulance. That perhaps has made the army wary of revealing what it knows, or thinks it knows, but one failure shouldn't become an excuse.

The IDF has the equipment, resources and manpower needed, not only to fight the war against the Qassam-launching gangs, but also to wage the propaganda war. No one else can do it for the soldiers. They are in a unique position to understand what is going on in the field and have direct access to the compelling photos that would make for great TV images if they were released on time.

If only Miri Regev cared as much about getting Israel's story onto CNN as she does about tomorrow's headline in Yediot Achronot.

Spotlight on Rashi's Daughters: California author Maggie Anton's first novel, Rashi's Daughters: Joheved, won three book awards recently at BookExpo America in Washington D.C. The first of a proposed three-volume family saga, the book focuses on the eldest daughter of Salomon ben Isaac, the great 11th-century scholar known as Rashi.

At a time when most women were illiterate, Rashi taught Talmud to his daughters. While Rashi is famous for his extensive Talmud commentaries, almost nothing is known about his daughters besides their names and those of their husbands and sons. The novel explores the personal and intellectual lives of these women, who were also vintners, midwives, merchants and mothers of the next generation of talmudic scholars. Published by Banot Press.

CISEPO holds musical fundraiser at Hart House

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

The Canada International Scientific Exchange Program (CISEPO), which aims to foster Arab and Israeli co-operation through education, research and health initiatives, is holding a musical fundraiser at Hart House.

CISEPO operates a program in Israeli, Jordanian and Palestinian communities that involves the early detection and treatment of infant heredity deafness. The organization runs a surgical, scientific and medical exchange program, among other exchange programs, and youth smoking prevention in the Middle East is the subject of one of its research projects. CISEPO also builds healthier communities in Canada, and has worked with aboriginal communities that require water purification.

The concert, featuring saxophonist Paul Brodie and harpist Erica Goodman, takes place at 8 p.m. on June 21 at Hart House on the University of Toronto campus.

Brodie, who was named an officer of the Order of Canada in 1994, is known worldwide. He is a skilful player of four types of saxophones – the piping soprano, the alto, the tenor and the booming bass – and is conversant in classical, folk and jazz idioms.

Goodman, a Juno Award winner, has performed extensively in Europe, Japan, throughout Canada and the United States, and has performed for Queen Elizabeth II, former prime minister Pierre Trudeau and former U.S. president John F. Kennedy.

With the concert at Hart House, CISEPO hopes to raise awareness of the organization. The funds raised from the event will go to support the organization's efforts to improve the quality of life for children in the Middle East and build healthy communities in Canada and the Middle East, said CISEPO founder and chair Arnold Noyek, an ear, nose and throat specialist at Mount Sinai Hospital and a professor at the U of T.

Over the past 11 years, CISEPO has quietly and effectively worked across borders and beyond politics and conflict to help children in the Middle East. "It has been one of Canada's best-kept secrets, and also one of its greatest humanitarian, scientific and educational successes," said Joseph Mapa, president of Mount Sinai Hospital.

"Its success is based on Canadian values, expertise and programs, such as Ontario's recent initiative to [give] hearing [tests] and treat all newborn babies as needed."

Harvey Skinner, chair of Public Health Sciences at the U of T, said the creation of co-operative networks builds much-needed bridges of trust and confidence between Arab and Israeli academics, physicians, scientists, hospitals, universities and societies.

"This special concert will herald a message of hope, that CISEPO and Canadians are doing something pioneering on the ground in the Middle East and effectively tackling significant public heath issues."

CISEPO, which is based at the Department of Public Health Sciences at the U of T and the Peter A. Silverman Centre for International Health at Mount Sinai Hospital, is affiliated with many universities and hospitals across Canada.

For more information about CISEPO, call Arnold Noyek at 416-978-4460 or visit www.cisepo.ca.

General concert admission is $20 and inner-circle tickets, which include a pre-concert garden party, are $50. For tickets, call 416-978-8849 or visit www.uofttix.ca.

Some TJFF films available on DVD

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

The Toronto Jewish Film Festival had another successful run in May, and as program co-ordinator for the festival, I've received quite a few questions regarding what films are available on home video or DVD.

Actually, a few of the films are available, including Paper Clips, which has come out on a two-disc DVD set that includes a number of bonus features.

This film about a group of middle school students in Whitwell, Tenn., creating a memorial to the six million Jews murdered during the Holocaust, was shown four times at this year's festival and each screening was sold out. It is now available on DVD for home viewing, but it may require you to place a special order with your video retailer or a trip to the Internet to obtain a copy.

Several of the films in the highly successful Rhythm & Jews series have also been released on home video.

These include Trevor Nunn's acclaimed presentation of the Gershwin classic, Porgy & Bess. This production was performed by the Glyndebourne Opera and the London Philharmonic Orchestra.

Brooklyn Babylon, the 2001 drama set during the time of the Crown Heights riots and which depicts a fictional romance between an Orthodox Jewish girl and a black Rastafarian musician, should be available in many of the better video stores in the city.

You can also look for Somewhere Over the Rainbow: Harold Arlen, a documentary about the life and times of Jewish composer Harold Arlen, who wrote such memorable songs as Stormy Weather and Blues in the Night, as well as many other songs that became identified with African-American singers and musicians.

Other films in the Rhythm & Jews series available on home video include Godfathers & Sons, Paul Robeson: Here I Stand and Blue Note.

But one word of warning. Although all of the above films are available, that does not mean that video stores will carry them. In fact, the only way to get most of these films is to ask the video store to order them for you or to go online at www.amazon.com or www.amazon.ca and order them there.

This may also be the case with several other films we showed at the festival this year.

We Want the Light, Christopher Nupen's documentary about the relationship between Jews and Germans, as seen through music, is available by calling the film festival office at 416-324-9121 and leaving a message there. We have received a limited number of copies of the DVD.

Knowledge Is the Beginning: Daniel Barenboim and the West-Eastern Divan Orchestra is available at better video stores or online.

The Lee Grant documentary about the relationship between Kirk and Michael Douglas, A Father... a Son... Once Upon a Time in Hollywood is also available on DVD.

Other films will be coming out on DVD throughout the year, including Sarah Silverman: Jesus Is Magic and 39 Pounds of Love.

Films that receive commercial theatrical runs usually come out on DVD some six to 12 months afterward, so you can watch for such films as Only Human and La Petite Jerusalem (Little Jerusalem) to arrive in stores at the end of the year or early 2007.

The bad news in all this is that the film I have received the most requests about, Gloomy Sunday, is not available on DVD anywhere and I don't know when it will become available. The latest news I have received is that the film may be released in theatres in Toronto in the near future.

Watch the pages of The CJN or subscribe by e-mail to the News & Schmooze newsletter (click on the newletter at www.tjff.com) distributed by the Toronto Jewish Film Festival and I'll update you from time to time.

FRESH BREAD AT ISRAEL MUSEUM

"Bread: Daily and Divine," a new exhibition at the Israel Museum in Jerusalem, explores the role of bread in secular traditions and religious rituals in the three major monotheistic religions. The exhibition features a wide variety of breads alongside archeological artifacts, holy vessels, works of art, films and ethnographical tools relating to the bread-making process.

Both Judaism and Christianity assign an essential function to bread in their ceremonial meals celebrating the main rites of passage during the year. In Islam, bread has acquired an almost sacred status in daily life, and is commonly referred to as "God's blessing."

"We are not always aware of the myriad hidden meanings that our daily slice of bread may convey," said exhibition curator, Noam Ben-Yossef. "The process of bread-making, from kneading dough and letting it rise, to shaping and then baking it in the oven, resembles an ever-renewing miracle. Above all, bread represents the dawn of civilization. It was in order to make bread that humans learned to domesticate grain and fashion the first pots."

Upswing in Israel Tourism: Tourism to Israel jumped 30 per cent in the first four months of 2006 as compared to the same period last year, according to new figures released by the Israeli Ministry of Tourism.

Israel welcomed 695,000 visitors from January through April. Tourist traffic from North America surged 34 per cent, with 174,000 visitors from the United States and 17,591 from Canada.

"Thirty per cent growth in tourism is encouraging, and only emphasizes the need for further investment in the industry to realize our goal of bringing three million visitors to the country this year," said Tourism Minister Isaac Herzog.

Lower Manhattan Synagogue: The historic 1887 Eldridge Street Synagogue was the chief beneficiary of an awards dinner held in New York recently that raised more than $1.2 million (US) to complete a restoration of the national historic landmark. The evening featured a live auction and a musical performance by Woody Allen and his New Orleans Jazz Band.

Holocaust history solid work of scholarship

The World Must Know: The History of the Holocaust as Told in the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum by Michael Berenbaum, the Johns Hopkins University Press, paperback.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C., is one of the finest institutions of its kind.

So when a book bears its imprimatur, attention must be paid.

Thirteen years ago, The World Must Know: The History of the Holocaust as Told in the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum was published, and it was then hailed as a comprehensive account of an unprecedented crime.

The deportation of Jews from Lublin, Poland.

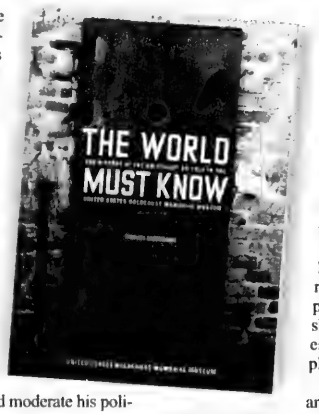
Recently, this extremely useful volume was reissued in a revised paperback edition. The author, historian Michael Berenbaum, was a project director at the museum, and served as president of Steven Spielberg's Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation.

The updated edition contains new photographs, redrawn charts, an expanded bibliography and a new section on the Holocaust in Greece. But in all other respects, The World Must Know is the same solid work of scholarship.

In the main, it unfolds in chronological order, beginning with the emergence of Nazism in Germany, which was home to a fairly prosperous and assimilated Jewish community.

Berenbaum cites the noxious views of the famous composer Richard Wagner to illustrate the deep-seated anti-Semitism that was at the bedrock of German society in the 19th century. "I hold the Jewish race to be the born enemy of pure humanity and everything noble in it," he once said in a typical remark.

Sentiments such as these, combined with Germany's ignominious defeat in the wake of World War I, were no doubt a factor in the rise of Adolf Hitler, who turned to politics after failing miserably as an artist.



As Berenbaum reminds us, Hitler was not elected, but appointed. The man who catapulted him to the chancellorship, President Paul von Hindenburg, hoped that Hitler would end the political chaos and moderate his policies.

What a miscalculation!

The Nazis, hell-bent on revamping Germany and persecuting its Jewish citizens, never had any intention of accommodating themselves to the Weimar Republic. As Josef Goebbels, Hitler's future propaganda minister, said, "We come as enemies."

Racism was the central and pervasive theme of Nazi ideology, as Berenbaum demonstrates at length. It shaped social and foreign policy and, tragically, engendered the Holocaust.

Before reaching the core of his narrative, he dwells on the Nazi economic boycott against Jews, the book burnings, the nature of Nazi propaganda, the "science" of race and the 1935 Nuremberg laws, which stripped Jews of their citizenship, defined racial identity and forbade sexual relations between Jews and Christians.

He reminds us, if a reminder is even needed, that this nationwide pogrom, a prelude to the Holocaust, was anything but spontaneous, as the Nazis never tired of publicly claiming.

Just before midnight on Nov. 9, 1938, the chief of the Gestapo, Heinrich Muller, dispatched a telegram to all police units letting them know that "in shortest order, actions against Jews and especially their synagogues will take place in all of Germany."

The state-inspired violence triggered another exodus of Jews from Germany, and Berenbaum takes note of this massive migration.

Writing of the fate of Jews in Nazi-occupied western Europe, he says that it differed from country to country and depended on three factors: the degree of control exercised by the Nazis, the history of the Jews in the region and the behaviour of the local population.

Interestingly enough, the Nazis confined Jews to ghettos only in eastern Europe, and in a chapter on that topic, Berenbaum says that Polish and Russian Jews were completely ghettoized by 1942, when Germany made its fateful decision to murder the Jews of Europe en masse.

His observations on the Warsaw and Lodz ghettos include comments on the Jewish Councils, the bodies whose authority derived from the Nazis.

The heroic 1943 Warsaw Ghetto uprising is given ample space, as are other ghetto revolts. In the face of overwhelming odds, Jews scarcely had a chance. But, as Berenbaum observes, "Resistance was its own reward."

In remarks on Jewish partisan activity, he delivers the doleful verdict that, while Jewish fighters were treated as equals and with respect in countries such as the Soviet Union and Yugoslavia, they could expect little help from the non-Jewish population in Poland, Ukraine, Latvia, Lithuania and Estonia.

Inexplicably, he does not offer an explanation why this was the case.

As might be expected in a book of this calibre, Berenbaum's chapter on the death camps, from Auschwitz-Birkenau to Sobibor, ranges far and wide. What they generally had in common, apart from being located in Poland, was that they were near major railroad lines.

Which brings him to a still-painful issue: Why was Auschwitz not bombed by the Allies?

Allied aircraft dropped tons of bombs on subsidiary camps in the vicinity, but spared Auschwitz. Berenbaum addresses the matter, but does not really answer his own question.

He devotes quite a few pages to slave labour in the camps, where conditions were brutal and prisoners often worked 11-hour shifts with a minimum of sleep and almost no food.

Prominent German companies, notably BMW, I.G. Farben and Daimler-Benz, availed themselves of such workers on an entirely voluntary basis.

Only two nations under Nazi domination, Denmark and Bulgaria, resisted demands for the deportation of their Jewish citizens, and Berenbaum wisely discusses these exceptions to the rule.

He also pays tribute to Zegota, a Catholic organization in Poland that aided Jews by providing them with safe hiding places, money and false identity papers.

The book does not end with the liberation of the concentration camps and Nazi Germany's downfall. Berenbaum analyzes the post-war Nuremberg war crimes trials, the flight of displaced Jewish refugees and the 1946 pogrom in Kielce, Poland.

The photographs scattered throughout The World Must Know are sharp and clear and usually chilling. They add an extra dimension to a book worthy of any good library.

Medical miracles do happen

By VIVIAN ROSENBERG

Who said miracles don't happen? Especially scientific ones!

On April 21, 2005, I received a telephone call at 10:20 p.m. from Toronto General Hospital: "Vivian, we have two lungs waiting for you. Please get here ASAP."

Immediately, excitement and joy suffused me. With my husband at my side, I had only one quick task before leaving for the hospital – to phone my three sons.

On April 21 this year, I celebrated the first day of my second birthday. Literally, I had received a gift of life. It has been an amazing, exciting and most humbling experience.

My journey here commenced in 1985 when I was diagnosed as having emphysema and chronic obstructive pulmonary disease (COPD), a pernicious illness that often moves slowly but rarely stops. Fortunately, my case was managed by wonderful doctors at Toronto General Hospital, and I was able to keep working for some time in a challenging and enjoyable career.

Over the years, however, I had a number of infections, and in March 2000, I was hospitalized and wound up on supplemental oxygen 24 hours a day. Having to leave work was terrible. But, after crying in my tea for the proverbial 15 minutes, I decided the oxygen tank was my best friend, and so it was for the next five years. It went everywhere with me – to family, friends, movies, dinners. Over those five years, I grew steadily weaker, more susceptible to life-threatening infections, and I was hospitalized many times.

In January 2005, I was told I had less than two years to live. My options were a transplant or what the medical experts called a lobectomy, which involved cutting away the diseased tissue of the lungs, leaving whatever remained of the good tissue. The surgeon told me it could buy me some time, with a possible transplant down the road, which didn't look or sound to me like the famous yellow brick road.

Research shows that 10 per cent of patients don't survive lung transplant surgery and 20 per cent do not survive the first year. Still, those numbers sounded like pretty good odds to me and I went for broke! I did not even question the seriousness and risks.

I had a comprehensive medical assessment and was put on the transplant list. The assessment phase, including myriad tests, was my introduction to the level of detail and comprehensiveness of this astonishing program. I was immediately enrolled in the hospital exercise program three days a week, walking the treadmill, lifting weights, pedalling a bike, all while dragging my best friend – six to eight litres of oxygen.

What followed was no less than a scientific miracle that still evokes tears of deep gratitude and appreciation for a dedicated, highly competent transplant team at Toronto General and a family and friends who were always there for me.

I was one of the fortunate ones. From the time I was placed on the transplant list, my wait was a relatively short two months, six days and 10 hours – not that I was counting. In the hospital, my family was told that I had been at the end of my disease, an idea that somehow had never crossed my mind.

On April 21, when they wheeled me into surgery, I was overjoyed and excited, while my poor husband felt utterly bereft, terrified he would never see me again. Thankfully, seven hours later, he did see me. The surgeon told me it takes one hour to remove a lung and one hour to put one in. That would be four hours, and presumably the additional three hours were for plumbing and administration.

My hospital stay was 18 days, and I was on a respirator. The physicians and nurses were truly remarkable and extraordinarily competent and compassionate. How often have we heard of a surgeon visiting a patient up to three times a day for a chat and check-up? My surgeon did just that.

Nursing was one-on-one. A vivid memory of my first day post-surgery is of my nurse, Graham, tenderly combing my hair, telling me how well I was doing, while he kept a sharp eye on the computer at my bedside listing my vital statistics. His humanity brought a deep rush of tears.

My hospital stay was almost pain free and always positive, despite many ups and downs. I was probably flying high, fuelled on steroids and pain killers, but who cared? The excitement of being taken off supplemental oxygen made me euphoric. The staff had me walking almost immediately – me, who could barely walk up a short flight of steps days earlier.

The day of my discharge I was told to report to the hospital exercise room the very next day! And I did, albeit in slow motion. What followed is almost too fantastic to relate. I was given my own private telephone number where I remain in contact with my own nurse co-ordinator. It also gives me constant access to a transplant team of caring physicians at the top of their field. Care was and remains a mere telephone call away, without a "your call is important to us." There literally isn't a crack to fall between.

Throughout my experience I was most fortunate to have a loving family and dedicated friends from whom I drew enormously sustaining strength. I felt as if I was literally ensconced in a warm security blanket of protective loving care. This was my sustenance.

The transplant team at Toronto General is considered one of the best in the world. The staff continue to push the envelope in research and develop new methods and treatments to improve procedures currently in use.

While there has been profound joy in the many lives saved so also have tears been shed at the loss of life, particularly of those on the waiting list who just didn't have the strength to hold out till their turn came. Some waits are horrendously long, particularly for kidneys.

In Canada, we have one of the lowest rates of organ donation among industrialized countries. There is a continual need for a campaign of greater awareness. Organ and tissue transplantation includes heart, lungs, liver, kidneys and corneas. Transplantation is an area that is constantly growing in its ability to save and extend lives. Many leaders of the major religions are strongly urging their community members to sign donor cards to save and extend a life.

So what is life like for me today? In the early months, there were endless clinic visits with exercise in the gym three days a weeks. Medically, there are what I choose to call "blips," and I deal with them as they come. I now take more than 20 pills daily, many quite powerful, but hey, no more puffers. There are CAT scans, X-rays, MRIs and endless vials of my blood taken. Phone calls advising me of results always follow, keeping me fully informed. Thankfully, the dust is starting to settle, and fewer visits are needed.

My life has changed dramatically since the surgery. I can climb subway stairs without gasping, stay up late, shop for groceries, dance and visit with family and friends. In the past, these activities of daily living were difficult, and many times, impossible. Where would I be today without the life-saving thoughtfulness of my donor and his or her family? There certainly would not have been a second chance for life. Strict confidentiality prevents me from knowing anything about my donor. With a need to express my profound appreciation, I wrote a long letter of thanks, through the hospital, to the donor's family, telling them of the gift of life they had given me. My hope was to give some meaning to their tragic loss. We have so much to be proud of in our medical accomplishments, but we can't sit on our laurels. Please sign your donor card, talk about it with your family, circle of friends and colleagues. Keep the topic on the radar. Spread the word. You literally have the power to save lives!

My transplant has enabled me to re-engage with the many beautiful and exquisite gifts life bestows upon us. There is volunteer work and the hope of returning to some part-time work. I savour the sun and the wind on my face. My grateful heart, deep humility and tears of gratitude have not dissipated. I never take for granted my citizenship in the very civil society of Canada, the country that has made all this possible.

Who said miracles don't happen? I celebrate life every day.

Winnipeg athlete invited to try out for Winter Olympics team

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Geoff Rosenbaum grew up in an athletic family. His sister, Trisha, has been around the world as a member of Canada's national ringette team. Older brother Michael has excelled in baseball, softball and Tae Kwon Do.

Rosenbaum's field of dreams has been track and field – but that is about to change.

The pentathlete is one of a number of Canadian summer athletic stars who have been recruited by the Canadian Olympic Committee (COC) to try out for the XXIst Winter Games in Vancouver in 2010. He's being considered for a possible spot in bobsleigh or skeleton racing.

The recruitment of Rosenbaum and other Canadian summer athletic stars to switch to winter sports represents a sea change in the COC's thinking. Rather than sitting back and waiting for athletes to come forward, the COC's aggressive new "Own The Podium" program aims to find athletes, test them and train them.

The 29-year-old Jewish Winnipegger has been competing in track and field events since high school. "I ranked best in high school in the decathlon [consisting of hurdles, long jump, sprints, high jump, shot put, discus, pole vault and javelin]," Rosenbaum said.

At the University of Manitoba, his principal event was the pentathlon, consisting of the 60-metre and 1,000-metre hurdles, the high jump and the long jump and the shot put. Three years ago, he finished sixth in the competition at the Inter-University Games.

Last year, he chose to compete in the Maccabiah Games in Israel instead of the Canadian university competition. He finished third in both the 110-metre hurdles and the 4 x 100-metre event. He finished fifth in the long jump.

But Rosenbaum is very excited about the possibility of competing in the Winter Olympics, even though he has never tried winter sports before.

He's been approached to try out for either the bobsleigh or skeleton team. It seems that he is the ideal size for skeleton racing. He and other recruits were scheduled to head to Regina last month to be tested for strength, conditioning and psychological makeup. A chosen few will be invited to train in Calgary for the Canadian national team.

"I'd really like to make the team," Rosenbaum said. "I'm slowing down in track, but this is something new. Actually, it's really recharged my batteries."

Rosenbaum has a degree in physical education and is currently working on his master's in sport biomechanics. He has one year of university track and field competition to look forward to.

Looking to his career following university, Rosenbaum would most like to coach, but he is considering other options, including sports prosthesis design or teaching phys-ed.

Pro baseball league planned for Israel

BOSTON, Mass. — Israel. The land of milk and honey… and artificial turf? As a further indication that the globalization of baseball is upon us, a Boston-based group announced recently that it's set to launch a professional baseball league in Israel. Opening day has been pegged for June 22, 2007.

"We have been working hand-in-hand since last summer with members of the Israel Association of Baseball – Israel's official baseball federation – to establish the foundation for the league," said founder Larry Baras. "The Israel Baseball League [IBL] is ready to take its place among the professional baseball leagues of the world."

The IBL has been able to attract impressive leadership to steward its march toward opening day.

Among the league's principals are Daniel Kurtzer, former U.S. ambassador to Israel and to Egypt, who will serve as its first commissioner, and Dan Duquette, former general manager of the Boston Red Sox, who will serve as the league's director of player development. Its advisory board includes Smith College professor Andrew Zimbalist, a respected baseball economist; Marvin Goldklang, minority owner of the New York Yankees and owner/operator of six minor league teams; and Marshall Glickman, former president of the NBA's Portland Trailblazers.

The IBL has notified Major League Baseball's office of the commissioner that it intends to apply for inclusion in the 2009 World Baseball Classic.

"From the way the rules have been established, if a player is eligible to be a citizen of a national team through ancestral descent, that player can receive dispensation from the WBC to play for that team," Baras said. "As such, we plan to recruit Jewish major and minor leaguers to play under the Israeli flag [similar to the way players Mike Piazza and Lenny Dinardo played for Italy in the 2006 WBC], as they are eligible to become Israeli citizens by virtue of their lineage."

Baras envisions six teams, playing 48-game schedules, with no games on Friday nights or Saturdays. The season, which would run from June to August, would allow college players to play between semesters, and Jewish players from U.S. colleges are welcome to play.

Though Israel is not widely known as a baseball country, the sport is not new to the Jewish state.

"Currently, there are over 2,000 players in Israel who regularly don baseball hats, cleats and gloves and play ball frequently. Israel has national teams that play in international tournaments and has sent several players to American colleges to continue their playing careers. Israel's first baseball field dates back to 1979, a veritable field of dreams located smack in the middle of wine country, with vistas as far as the eye can see," Baras said.

In addition to manning IBL rosters with Israeli-born players, teams will largely be stocked with players who have previously played at the minor league or collegiate level in the United States. To the degree possible, these players will be of Jewish extraction.

In terms of entertainment value, baseball in Israel will follow the lead of U.S. minor leagues by offering a broad variety of on-field promotions between innings and before and after games.

"This is going to be must-see entertainment in Israel the likes of which it has never witnessed before," Baras stated. "It will be geared to be wholesome fun for the entire family that will transcend the mere playing of a baseball game, as enjoyable as that in itself will be."

Kurtzer, the former ambassador, has long been a proponent of baseball finding a home in Israel. "For too long, there has been a dearth of recreational activities in Israel, especially for its youth. And nothing can be more fun than watching and cheering on your hometown baseball team," he said.

Duquette plans to establish a bona fide baseball academy in Israel. "We intend to run camps and clinics throughout the country for players of all skills, ages, sexes, and denominations. A baseball field can be a great place for people to come and learn a sport together," he said. Among the goals of the academy will be to develop homegrown IBL players. Duquette's sports academy in Massachusetts will serve as the IBL's official U.S.-based training centre.

The league plans to begin play in existing soccer stadiums and baseball fields that will be retrofitted to better accommodate pro baseball. Talks have already begun with several potential franchise sites.

"Once the first couple of franchises are set, it's off to the races. We will start selling tickets and bringing in sponsors," said Baras. A campaign to raise funds from potential investors has already started.

Thinking about kids

Sandie Benitah
20Something

For the first time in my life, I experienced baby envy.

It happened when I met a girlfriend of mine for coffee and saw what a yummy mummy she had become.

She's the first of my friends to be pregnant, and while I've always sat on the fence over whether or not to have children of my own, I have to admit, seeing the glow in her eye and hearing her talk of possible names made me happy to think that one day, it could be me.

Today, I'm back on the fence and thinking that the only baby I can handle is the one I see in the mirror each day.

A good chunk of my friends are either married or getting engaged. Some of them want children, but the majority of my friends are either waiting or waiting to see if they'll change their mind about having kids or not.

I guess this selfishness must be a trend, because the other day on TV, there was an entire show dedicated to people who call themselves "Think-ers" — "Two Household Incomes, No Kids," thank you very much.

Never mind the cheeky acronym. I would argue these people are indeed the bright thinkers of society.

It's not the stress-free vacations and free-flow of money that I crave. I just want a life without the premature grey hair and wrinkles that having kids inevitably brings.

I've always been taught that having children is a big mitzvah and that the greatest gift Hashem can give me is a baby. But what if I'm just not cut out for it?

My first inkling that kids aren't for me came when I babysat my niece when she was just one year old. The poor baby perched herself by the door and wouldn't stop crying for her mama. No matter how many dolls I played with or lullabies I sang, nothing consoled her. She cried until she threw up, and instead of rushing to clean it up, I too started crying and felt my own food come up. I called my sister and demanded that she come home.

Nonetheless, today, my sisters know there's no one they can trust more than me to take care of their kids.

I don't care if my nephew is old enough to be celebrating his bar mitzvah, when he's with me, he knows he better not leave my sight for fear of what I will do to him. I've learned to relax a bit, though. Now, I try to remember to let go of his hand when his friends are around.

If I have kids, they will probably hate me. They won't be allowed to play hockey for fear they'll get a concussion. They won't be allowed to climb trees for fear they'll break a bone. I even decided they'd be home schooled after I saw what happened at Columbine.

I know. I'm nuts – that's why I'm not having kids!

I always had the strictest parents of all my friends, and my mom always made me understand their position by saying, "I'd rather you cry than I cry." I knew she meant that she loved me so much that any harm to me would hurt her even more.

Somehow, my mom succeeded in raising four girls who – thank heavens have never broken any bones and have never gotten into any kind of trouble.

She, too, was a yummy mummy, having had three kids in her early twenties. But times have changed since then.

Our streets aren't as safe to play in, and our schools are no longer a protected home away from home. The news is full of drama about kids in danger.

Maybe I'm thinking way too much, but for now, I'm too scared to be anything but a Thinker.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I have two wonderful girls who are lucky enough to have both sets of grandparents.

My parents see the kids at least one a week and their visit is usually very pleasant for all. My husband's parents, however, do not have the same effect in our home. They respect none of our rules and choose to sneak about and do what they want. Kayla, my eldest daughter, has a tendency to be overweight. We only have healthy snacks in the house, and the girls are fine with that.

When Jerry's parents come to visit, they bring chocolate and cookies. They know we forbid it, and yet they don't care. When our backs are turned, in goes a chocolate, and they encourage the girls to keep it a secret from us. Of course, this is just one example, but the list is long. What should I do?

Grandparent dilemma

Dear Grandparent dilemma

It truly is a great gift that your children have both sets of grandparents in their lives.

It is not unusual, however, for grandparents to want to spoil their grandchildren. Sometimes they love the kids to the point of it being detrimental. They can't see the bigger picture, as you can. All they want to do is shower the kids with love, and gifts of sweets are their way of showing affection. Is there something you can think of that is not food-related that they could bring the kids? Perhaps a book or a puzzle they could all enjoy together.

I realize this cookie thing is just the tip of the iceberg. The more serious problem is they do not have any regard for your rules, and that can sometimes be dangerous.

Jerry's parents raised Jerry when streets were safer, when kids didn't have so many allergies, when life in general was a little less structured, and he turned out just fine, so they don't see the harm.

I'm sure you and Jerry have already spoken to them, so it's time for action. Let them know that if they don't follow your rules, all visitation will have to be supervised.

Whatever you do, however, never spoil the bond Jerry's parents have with their grandchildren. It is precious and irreplaceable.

Fundamentalists in our own backyard

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

Elie Wiesel recently spoke at a Hillel of Greater Toronto program on the topic "Confronting fanaticism: building moral unity in a diverse society." The CJN quoted Wiesel on June 1 as saying, "The fanatic is seduced because [he] believes simply that he is superior… the fanatic believes only his words carry weight and others are empty of meaning and consequence… The fanatic has no questions, only answers… he doesn't have dialogues, only monologues… the fanatic lacks a sense of humour. He can shout, but not whisper."

Wiesel's description of a fundamentalist was enlightening and empowering. By defining fanatics in human terms (and making them real), the Nobel Peace Prize winner ensured that those in attendance understood that they could counter this dangerous movement by acting on their humanitarianism and their ability to make healthy choices. Further, Wiesel's choice of topics made it painfully clear that fanaticism is one of the most dire issues facing humankind today.

When identifying the ills of fundamentalism, however, it's also crucial that we as members of the Toronto Jewish community be courageous enough to look inward as well as outward, accepting that fanaticism exists within the wider Jewish world and, in fact, our very own neighbourhoods. We must be fully cognizant that just as the rise in fanaticism among Christians and Muslims encourages a sense of superiority among some people in these groups, it does the same up and down the Bathurst Street corridor.

Indeed, fundamentalism is alive and well in our community. While Orthodox Jewry in general is in many ways accepting of, and willing to dialogue with, people of other beliefs and denominations, in the extreme corners of the Orthodox community, there is a very real belief among some people that they are the sole gatekeepers of God's words. This is personified through statements we have all heard – that the "goyim" are somehow inferior, and those who are less frum are "even worse."

If we are to use Wiesel's other definition, that the fanatic "believes only his words carry weight and others are empty of meaning and consequence," such extremism can also be found among some virulently secular Jews who think nothing of publicly deriding Israel for its "human rights abuses." They will often speak out in unbalanced and unfair ways, leaving little to no room for healthy debate and discussion. To these fundamentalists, Israel is the one and only bad guy in the Middle East mess – period!

Fundamentalism has existed throughout history, but it began gaining strength in the 1960s alongside the rise of the peace movement, and likely in response to its free spiritedness.

As this trend strengthened, segments of Christianity, Islam and Judaism set about establishing "born-again" movements within their respective religions to attract adherents through emotional and experiential programming and attractions. Within the Jewish world, droves of Jews flocked to join these groups, adding a new dimension to fundamentalism, whereby teachers and students interacted Jewishly in a very superficial manner. Torah learning and practice became simplified and lacking the very essence of what Judaism espouses – that truth comes with 70 different faces and demands complexity of thought and analysis.

Judaism is exquisite in its insistence that we utilize our individuality to dig deeply below the surface of ideas and Jewish expression. In order to do this, we are instructed to be brave warriors of truth and self-examination. Part of this is recognizing that a blustery wind of fundamentalism is blowing through our community, one that inhibits the Jewish people from achieving healthier growth as individuals and as a nation.

To fight fundamentalism is to question freely – like a child at the Passover seder table. It is also to create passionate and challenging dialogue, as well as to laugh hardily and appreciate that superiority only exists within humility, acceptance, and a driving wonderment.

It's back to the future for the Zionist Congress

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

TEL AVIV — Theodor Herzl launched his vision of a Jewish state at the First Zionist Congress in 1897 in Basel, Switzerland. More than a century later, Israel exists – and so does the congress Herzl launched.

Under the banner "The Dream Still Matters," more than 2,000 representatives from across the globe gathered this week in Jerusalem, from June 19 to 22, for the 35th Zionist Congress to keep the ideological torch alive.

"It's almost like a conscience to the country, the Zionism that will provide the fervour and commitment to allow Israel to grow and allow it to relate to a dream and not just day-to-day existence," said Marty Davis, director general of the department for Zionist activities of the World Zionist Organization, which holds the congress.

Dubbed the "Parliament of the Jewish people," the congress brings together Zionist activists from around the world to vote on topics ranging from civil marriage in Israel to the reduction of social and economic gaps between Israel's Jewish and Arab citizens.

The congress debates the policies of the World Zionist Organization (WZO), which helps determine half of the $350-million (US) budget of the Jewish Agency for Israel. The Jewish Agency is involved in immigration and absorption and runs religious, political and educational programs throughout the world.

The WZO has a $13.5-million budget, drawn from money raised by Keren Hayesod – its fundraising arm – and the Jewish Agency.

Zionist federations held elections in their home countries to select delegates to the congress. About 120,000 Jews outside Israel voted in the elections, which chose 750 people who could vote at the congress. Others will act as delegates and observers.

Delegates help choose people for key positions, among them the head of the Jewish National Fund and the treasurer of the Jewish Agency. Zeev Bielski, chairman of the WZO and the Jewish Agency, was expected to be re-elected to his post.

"The problem with elections abroad is that if 120,000 people voted, that means about 11 million did not vote – that is, the vast majority of world Jewry did not participate," said David Breakstone, head of the WZO's department for Zionist activities.

Birthright inspires dancer

Lisa Oberman

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

After going on birthright israel in 2004, ballet dancer Lisa Oberman knew immediately where she wanted to pursue her professional dance career.

Now almost 20, Oberman is making aliyah and has joined the Israel Ballet, the country's only major classical ballet company.

"I fell in love with Israel and knew in my heart that's where I wanted to dance," she says.

Joining the Israel Ballet is the culmination of a lifelong dream to dance professionally, says Oberman, who attended the Kirov Academy of Ballet (now the Universal Ballet Academy) in Washington, D.C., and danced with the USA Ballet in Illinois.

"I've been on stage since I was three years old. At four, I played the lead in Grease. Going away to a ballet school when I was 16 was the natural thing to do."

Oberman's mother Deborah, says that when Lisa was young, she took her to see Karen Kain in the Nutcracker Suite. "She turned to me and said, 'One day, that will be me.' I knew then where her future lay."

Lisa Oberman credits her dance teacher and mentor Tatiana Stepanova, of the Stepanova Dance Academy, for helping her focus on ballet when she was 14.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Cotler Backs Rae

OTTAWA — Mount Royal MP and former justice minister Irwin Cotler last week endorsed former Ontario NDP premier Bob Rae for the leadership of the federal Liberal Party. "He is a longtime friend whom I respect as a creative thinker and practitioner in matters of federalism, rights, social justice and public policy," said Cotler, a law professor at McGill University and former president of Canadian Jewish Congress. The backing came after Rae was endorsed by former federal health minister Ujjal Dosanjh.

New UIAFC President

OTTAWA — Ottawa resident Barbara Farber is the new president of UIA Federations Canada, the umbrella group for Canada's 10 Jewish federations. Farber, the first president to live outside Toronto or Montreal, had been UIAFC vice-president responsible for planning and allocations. She succeeds Montrealer Stanley Plotnick as president for a two-year term, UIAFC said. Farber is CEO of the Leikin Group, a real estate development firm, as well as a member of Ottawa's police services board and chair of the Algonquin College Foundation.

Funding Renewed

LONDON, Ont. — The Ontario government announced last week that it's renewing $200,000 in funding for the province-wide Hate Crimes and Extremism police investigation unit. Community Safety Minister Monte Kwinter made the commitment at police headquarters in London, Ont. London police chief Murray Faulkner said the funding is welcome, but should be renewed for more than one year at a time, the London Free Press reported. The unit, formed in 2003, includes officers from 10 Ontario cities.

Rabbi Faces Protest

OTTAWA — Carleton University awarded an honorary degree last week to Rabbi Reuven Bulka, spiritual leader of Ottawa's Congregation Machzikei Hadas, over objections about his ties to a group that says homosexuality can be cured with therapy. The Orthodox rabbi sits on the advisory board of the U.S.-based National Association for Research and Therapy of Homosexuality. Carleton University Student Association president Shawn Menard had asked the school's senate not to award the degree, saying it would alienate gay and lesbian students and violate Carleton's equity policy. The rabbi told the Ottawa Sun that therapy is controversial, but people should still be free to talk about it.

Circumcision Deal Cut

ALBANY — New York state health officials and Orthodox rabbis reached an agreement on a controversial circumcision procedure. According to the compromise, signed June 12, mohels who perform the procedure known as metzitzah b'peh must sanitize their hands like a surgeon, the Albany Times-Union reported. They must also clean their mouths with a sterile alcohol wipe and rinse with a mouthwash containing at least 25 per cent alcohol. Controversy has surrounded several mohels' use of metzitzah b'peh, in which blood is sucked directly from the wound. It has allegedly led to babies contracting herpes, including one who died.

Trip Boosts Identity

BOSTON — Birthright israel alumni identify more strongly with Israel and the Jewish community than peers who applied but did not go on the program, says a study of nearly 3,000 young people who visited Israel on birthright and 1,000 who applied but did not go. It was conducted by the Cohen Center for Modern Jewish Studies at Brandeis University. Birthright offers free, 10-day trips to Israel for North American Jews 18 to 26. About 41 per cent of university students who took the trip in 2002 are now involved with Hillel at their schools, versus 13 per cent of non-participants.

Wine Labels Nixed

STOCKHOLM — Sweden backed away from a move to label wine made in the Golan Heights as coming from occupied territory. Golan wine will be sold without saying where it was produced, according to Lena Posner-Korosi, president of the Official Council of Swedish Jewish Communities.

Islamist Plotters Jailed

PARIS — A French court sentenced 25 Islamists for plotting terror attacks in Paris that may have included Israeli targets. The group's leaders received eight- to 10-year sentences June 14, while others got lighter terms. The leaders, who are mostly Algerian, allegedly received terrorist training in Afghanistan or Chechnya.

Inmates Get Redress

BERLIN — Ex-inmates of Nazi camps in Tunisia can now apply for compensation from Germany after a deal was reached June 13 between the Claims Conference and Germany's Finance Ministry. Germany has committed a total of $276 million (US) to this and several related causes. "It is the first time that the suffering of women and children in Tunisia has been recognized," said Claims Conference executive vice-president Gideon Taylor. A few hundred people are eligible, he said.

German Official Meets With Jewish Groups

OTTAWA — While in Ottawa for a two-day visit earlier this month that included an appearance before Parliament's national security committee, Germany's State Secretary of Defence Christian Schmidt attended a breakfast meeting at the offices of Canadian Jewish Congress.

The meeting gave Jewish leaders an opportunity to convey their concerns about issues such as the resurgence of anti-Semitism in Germany and threats to Israel by Iran.

Schmidt, speaking informally and taking questions, said German skinheads and neo-Nazis are "a small minority, but a very aggressive minority… this is not only a German phenomenon but, unfortunately, we have this all over Europe."

In addition to Congress CEO Bernie Farber and director of government relations Eric Vernon, guests included Mitchell Bellman, president of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa; Ofir Gendelman from the Israeli Embassy; and Maj.-Gen. Edward Fitch of the Canadian Forces.

CUPE members picket against anti-Israel resolution

'This is a biased, one-sided resolution'

By JESSICA FREIMAN
CJN Intern

"1, 2, 3, 4, they stole our voices from the floor." That was the rallying cry last Friday at an information picket attended by dozens of members of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) outside CUPE Ontario's offices in Scarborough.

Their purpose? To have CUPE Ontario rescind Resolution 50, which calls for a boycott of, and divestment from, Israel unless it recognizes the Palestinian right to self determination. Passed unanimously by 896 delegates at the union's convention last month, it also slams Israel's "apartheid wall," the barrier Israel is building to stop terror attacks originating in the West Bank.

"This is a biased, one-sided resolution. It's full of misinformation and we oppose it vehemently," said Rebecca Soberman, a picketer and member of CUPE local 2063, which includes workers from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Canadian Jewish Congress and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services Toronto.

"People have taken myth and put it in front of people to vote on the issue who don't know any better," Soberman said. "Israel wants a two-state solution and has always been working toward peace. Israel is a democracy."

Just as the National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education in Britain recently rescinded its call to boycott Israel, so must CUPE Ontario rescind Resolution 50, said a fact sheet distributed by picketers.

"We're hoping that this information picket will show why this resolution should never have gone on the floor for a vote," said Lil Nobel, president of CUPE local 2063, which pulled out of CUPE Ontario and joined CUPE National after a similar vote on Israel four years ago.

The picketers felt CUPE Ontario should never have voted on the resolution because Israel has undertaken "incredible measures... over the last several decades to promote the establishment of a viable, independent Palestinian state," the fact sheet said.

These measures include Israel's disengagement from Gaza last summer and its "dedication to a genuine peace process," it said.

"We don't see why CUPE Ontario should get involved with international politics," Nobel said. "If you're going to put together a resolution, you must look at both sides of the story. What was put on the floor was a biased, one-sided opinion."

Soberman said no politicians have spoken out on behalf of Resolution 50. "We've only seen people supporting our position. Obviously, many people agree with us," she said.

A Swedish editor

From the editor's desk

This is the story of Jackie Jakubowski, the editor and publisher of the Judisk Kronika (Jewish Chronicle), an edgy, provocative bimonthly publication of current Jewish affairs and commentary in Stockholm, Sweden.

In some respects, however, it is also the story of many of the generation of Jews born after World War II, whose parents survived the Nazis' attempt to destroy them and, who, perhaps as a result, engage the world with heightened purpose.

But let us return to Jackie Jakubowski, for it is his story first.

His parents were Polish Jews. His father, Shlomo, was born in Sompolno. He escaped from Warsaw and got as far east as Bialystok, where the Soviet police arrested him and then shipped him to a labour camp in Siberia. Conditions there were hard and horrible, but at least they were livable.

Like many other Polish Jews who survived the war in the Soviet Union, Jackie's father travelled south into the Muslim provinces of Uzbekistan and Kyrgyzstan, where he was recruited to fight in the Free Polish Army under the command of Wladyslaw Anders. Illness, however, intervened and kept him in Kyrgyzstan. Jackie's mother, Sara (Ingster), was born in Sosnowiecz Benzin. The majority of her war years were spent in Auschwitz.

Jackie's parents were among the 300,000 Polish Jews still alive in 1945. There had been three million in 1939. They met after the war. Both had returned to what had once been their homes, looking for remnants of their respective families or scraps of information about their whereabouts or their final fate. But there was no one and nothing to find.

They both drifted to Stettin, a relatively large city in the north of Poland near the German border, where they met and married. Five years later, with two young children in tow, ever the wandering, "displaced" persons, they moved to Katowice, in the south central part of the country.

Jackie's parents divorced in 1956. His mother took Batya to Israel, where they settled in Kibbutz Givat Hashlosha. Jackie stayed with his father in Poland. But they, too, were destined to leave the land in which they were born. For with the rise of a strong and noisy oppresive government, Shlomo and Jackie moved to Goteborg, Sweden, in 1970. A short while after they arrived, Shlomo died of cancer. Jackie was alone, a stranger in a strange land, without family, without language, without the footings of even minimal communal familiarity.

Jackie Jakubowski

The 19-year-old expatriate Pole, though, was extremely bright, inquisitive, a hungry reader, articulate, cool under pressure and an engaging thinker. To fulfil a dying wish of his father, he enrolled in the faculty of engineering. Indeed, he graduated at the top of his class. But he never actually worked as an engineer. Writing was too deeply embedded into his soul. Even while he was achieving high results in school, Jackie was a freelance essayist for a local daily newspaper on issues of culture and politics. It seemed right therefore, after graduation, to simply continue to do what he loved most to do: write.

In 1980, Jackie was offered a job as a journalist at Judisk Kronika. He has been there ever since, although in 1984, he received a scholarship to study at the Hebrew Union college in Los Angeles. After three years, he returned to Sweden with a master's degrees in Judaic studies. Typically, Jackie's novel and precise thinking won him the attention of his teachers and his colleagues. Despite his newness with the English language, his presentation of ideas and the acuity of his insights garnered a first-place reward in a widely contested essay contest on campus.

In 1990, the format and financing of Judisk Kronika changed into a bimonthly journal published by a privately owned foundation. Its trademark became and remains to this day, the stylings and thought of Jackie Jakubowski, namely high production values, provocative stories and crisp writing. He is an accomplished writer and essayist who is published widely in Sweden.

Some six million people live in Sweden. The number of Jews there is about the same as in Ottawa, some 15,000 to 18,000. Of late, the Scandinavian countries seem to have lurched decidedly away from Israel in the Jewish state's dispute with the Palestinian Authority. Much of the trade union movement, for example, has adopted pro-Palestinian positions.

It requires no small amount of dedication, conviction and sometimes even courage, to so readily and so reliably pick up the pen on Israel's behalf.

But for the exigencies of fate and the logic of his parents' choices, indeed if there was any logic apart from survival, Jackie could have been born in Israel or in North America, like so many other children of Polish survivors. But his destiny was to land in Sweden, to marry, to raise two children and to be the editor of the publication that defends Israel, that tries to make sense of the celebrations, the sorrows and the history of his people. We and the Jews of Sweden are the beneficiaries.

Administrators' resistance ends teacher awards

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

Resistance from school administrators and the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education has scuttled an annual parent-run awards program for teachers in local Jewish day schools, organizers told a private ceremony earlier this month.

Since 2002, the Teacher of Excellence Awards have honoured 10 teachers annually, but 2006 will be the final year of the program, its co-organizers and funders Michael Buckstein and Elan Pratzer told more than 70 teachers, nominators and committee members who gathered at Buckstein's home for a presentation ceremony June 8.

"We never planned on stepping on anyone's toes," Buckstein said, adding that he and Pratzer hoped to stay independent of schools and the BJE in order to avoid politics and better represent ordinary parents.

"Who are we trying to do this for?" Buckstein asked. "For teachers to feel good about their important work, and for parents, to take the focus away from critiquing… to focus on what's good."

Buckstein blamed "pockets of resistance" among school administrators and the BJE for the decision to end the program.

Administrators have blocked promotional efforts, he said. While some schools gave out flyers and encouraged nominations, others refused. "Why would administrators come out against it… rather than [try to] make it something positive?" Buckstein asked.

When a principal says, "I'm not prepared to participate," a nomination can't go before the awards committee, because there's no way to distinguish between a teacher who's good for one student or an outstanding one who affects all students, said awards manager Catherine Gitzel.

"Just because you reward one teacher doesn't mean you're saying something bad about another," said Pratzer, referring to criticism that the awards singled out some teachers at the expense of others.

The Toronto program is modelled on one that Buckstein's textile manufacturing company, Barrday, established in Cambridge, Ont., as a philanthropic effort to honour 10 teachers annually in public and Catholic schools.

The reception in Cambridge has been overwhelming, Buckstein said. Schools participate, newspapers offer free promotion, and the local chamber of commerce has thrown itself behind the program, which has grown to include a school of excellence award.

"All cynicism in Cambridge dissolved in year one," said Buckstein, adding that here, resistance only seemed to grow. "Every year, someone else comes out strongly [against it]… It's a sad commentary."

In Toronto, students or parents submitted nomination letters, which were verified with school principals. Then, a neutral committee of 10 people (Buckstein and Pratzer weren't on it) read the letters and chose 10 winners.

Co-founder hopes awards will continue in some form

"This is the dream of the Jewish community: Jews across the religious spectrum coming together to honour teachers," Buckstein said.

He said he still believes in the awards and hopes they will continue in some form next year, either under official auspices or at a grassroots level.

Yael Seliger, associate director of the BJE, said her organization had no animosity toward the program, but that school principals as a group "decided they'd rather remain neutral."

The principals were uncomfortable "putting one teacher in the limelight as opposed to the other," particularly based on nominations that might be highly subjective, Seliger said. "We didn't feel we could become an active partner."

She added that the BJE's lack of endorsement didn't imply any "less support and admiration for the teaching profession… we're all teachers at heart."

Uri Korin, director of education at Bialik Hebrew Day School, said Bialik's "opposition [to the awards] was always very clear… We do not highlight the performance of one person."

The school's Labour Zionist philosophy "supports every attempt to excel," but can't embrace an award based on "factors that do not pertain to school performance," such as parent satisfaction, Korin said.

But Gail Baker, principal of the Toronto Heschel School, said she's not only "very, very proud" of 2006 winner Ehud Viner, a Grade 5 and 6 Hebrew and Chumash teacher, she's also been "delighted" to support the awards, especially because she "didn't have to be the one to nominate" teachers.

Despite the fact the awards were not a BJE initiative, Baker said the board could have encouraged administrators to support teachers through the program.

Nominating parents Barbie and Yossi Dukes said Orna Goldberg of Associated Hebrew Schools deserves recognition for transforming their daughter, Bayli, who had previously been negative about Jewish studies, into a student who wakes up in the morning singing Hebrew songs.

Goldberg, a 2006 winner who has been teaching for more than 20 years, often spends evenings on the phone, translating Hebrew stories for English-speaking parents.

She also calls when nothing's wrong. "It's important to hear [that] something wonderful happened today," Goldberg said.

Another 2006 winner, Nicky Kagan, a 25-year-teacher of English and social studies at Bnei Akiva Schools (Ulpanat Orot and Or Chaim), said the awards honour not only individual teachers, but an often-misunderstood profession.

Teachers are "an easy target," because of their long vacations and the perception that "the only time you work is when you're actually standing in the classroom," Kagan said.

Heschel students go silent and sleepless for Darfur

By JESSICA FREIMAN
CJN Intern

As students in the Toronto Heschel School's Grade 8 class approach graduation, imminent freedom is not the only thing on their minds.

At a time of year when other graduating students are thinking mainly about themselves, Heschel's 8A class is focused on helping the people of Sudan's troubled Darfur region.

The 14 students in Eli Savage's class recently held a 24-hour fundraiser to raise awareness about the humanitarian crisis in Darfur, which has displaced 2.5 million people and killed tens of thousands.

"We wanted to do something to help the people in Darfur, because we felt that their voices weren't being heard. We decided to not either speak or sleep for 24 hours, and had people sponsor us," said Alec Amato, 13.

"The point of not talking was so that we could know what it feels like to be Darfurian, since their voices are not being heard."

The idea to stay awake through the night was derived from the traditions of Shavuot, he said. "We stay up all night on Shavuot because we're thankful for getting the Torah and we study it. We are thankful for what we have, so we stayed up doing the things we like to do."

"We got the idea for a fundraiser after Stephen Adler, [director of public policy at] Canadian Jewish Congress, talked with us about Darfur," Trister said.

"When Stephen talked to us, he said that he understands that we're teenagers who are just trying to do our thing, but there are kids who don't even get to become teenagers just because they're living in a certain area. It really put things into perspective," said Rebecca Cowley, 13.

The teens' 24-hour no talking/no sleep-athon raised more than $1,000 for Right to Play, a Toronto-based international humanitarian organization that uses sport and play to help youth in the most disadvantaged areas of the world.

"These kids grow up learning about war, and we want kids to learn not how to shoot someone, but how to shoot a basketball," Amato said.

Age fails to slow rabbi emeritus

She'arim's 2006 honoree completes speaking tours in Germany and Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The papers, books and computer on Rabbi Erwin Schild's desk attest to the fact that at age 86, the rabbi emeritus of Adath Israel Congregation hasn't truly retired.

With his German-English dictionary at hand, the rabbi was preparing in late May for a two-week, three-city speaking tour in his native Germany. He was also preparing for his weekly study group – "call it 'eclectic Torah.'" Two weeks earlier, he returned from leading a congregational seniors trip to Israel.

"I was by far the oldest person," he said, chuckling. "And I kept them going." His claim is likely no exaggeration, given the rabbi's longtime penchant for keeping fit. In addition to regular fitness walks, he still does "a bit of jogging."

Rabbi Erwin Schild

On June 28, Rabbi Schild – who became a member of the Order of Canada in 2001 and in 2000 received an equivalent honour from the German government for his interfaith efforts in Germany – will be honoured by She'arim Hebrew Day School at its annual tribute dinner.

Although the rabbi, who arrived in Toronto in 1942 and has served Adath Israel since 1947, has no personal connection with the school, he said he admires the work it does, providing children with learning disabilities "a chance for proper Jewish education."

Also, he added, "I like the idea of a school not associated with any particular movement. It's open to all. Children come from all streams of the community."

But it's Rabbi Schild's involvement in interfaith projects, more than interdenominational ones, for which he has become known. For more than two decades, following an initial invitation in 1982, he has travelled to Germany every year to speak to Christian groups there.

This month's tour includes seminars at academic and Christian institutions, and talks in two suburbs of Cologne about his early life there, before he left Germany at age 18. "It gives me a chance to explain what Jews went through in Germany and after Germany."

Over the years, the focus of his talks in Germany has shifted from "what Germany lost" in terms of its Jewish community, to simply "Judaism."

Emotionally, he said, the trips have become easier. "Really, Germany is quite different from what I remember in my childhood."

This month's trip was to include a day revisiting that childhood with two nieces and a nephew – his late sister's children – who planned to meet him in Cologne to visit the cemetery and see his school, the park he played in, and where he lived.

A prewar incident the rabbi recalls is indicative of how things have changed in recent years, and how they changed when Hitler came to power.

In the late 1920s, when the future rabbi was in Grade 1 or 2 and "the Nazi party existed, [but] no one took them seriously," his teacher brought a black man to school as a surprise for the class. "It was sort of a unique thing. Today if you ride the streetcar in Cologne, you have the same picture as in Toronto, an ethnic mix. The black man was a curiosity. There was no suggestion that he was in any way inferior."

A trip to Germany a few years ago ended up taking the rabbi back in time in an unexpected way. When he spoke to a group at Dachau, in a church on the site of the concentration camp where he was interned briefly in 1938, a teenage girl asked if she could use his story as the basis for a school project and conduct further archival research.

Among the documents she tracked down was a letter the rabbi's mother had written to the Gestapo when he was imprisoned at Dachau following Kristallnacht, along with other students from the Jewish teachers' seminary in Würzburg.

His mother wrote that he had documentation from the consulate of the Dominican Republic that would allow him to leave Germany. "It probably saved my life," he said.

Students learn about Darfur

Edan Baltman, 14, said this experience has taught him a lot about the situation in Darfur.

"It's bad that the government is reluctant to call it genocide since the conflict is between two Muslim groups," he said.

"I chose not to talk for the fundraiser, and I didn't make it through. I found it extremely hard and I found out how hard it is for them."

Baltman added that he hopes the fundraiser will raise awareness about Darfur. "It's certainly raised awareness in my school," he said.

Cowley and Amato believe that the Toronto Heschel School, which is named after the late Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel, has taught them to be socially conscious.

"[Rabbi] Heschel was a person who marched with Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and stood up for the African-Americans. We went to the Scream for Darfur rally at Queen's Park," Amato said.

"Even if you can just inform one person, it can really raise awareness. It's the little things that count."

Cowley added: "Heschel said that you have to pray with your feet. You have to do something instead of just talk about it."

New thinking needed

This is the time of year that brings a broad smile to the faces of most youngsters. School is ending for another year. Whether they are graduating or merely moving on to the next year, whether from public school or day school, our children's accomplishments are worthy of considerable praise.

So, too, are the accomplishments of our teachers, administrators and custodial staff, without whom there would be no formal education. All are part of a complex, integrated, humane network upon which we – parents, community and society – rely to instruct and inspire our children. Indeed, it is upon those efforts that our civilization advances.

Increasingly, lay leaders also play a vital role for and in our schools. This is especially so in the various day schools where volunteers are the selfless sinew of each school's governance and extra-curricular programs and, of course, in the local federations whose funding assistance to needy families enables many of our children to attend Jewish school.

Thus, as we commend the efforts of the individuals – professionals and lay leaders – who collectively make possible the remarkable achievements of our children, it is appropriate to focus attention on the most pressing issue in the near horizon of Jewish education: its cost.

Even where provincial governments do underwrite a portion of the expense of Jewish education, the cost of sending a child to Jewish school is painfully high. In Ontario however, where the provincial government discriminates against non-Catholic faith-based schools and no public funds reach Jewish schools, the cost is prohibitive. Many families will have no choice but to grudgingly, in some cases tearfully, decide that it is financially impractical, if not impossible, to send their children to Jewish schools. In that unhappy event, we will likely see, perhaps in one, but certainly not fewer than two decades, a hollowing out of enrolment in Jewish schools of the core middle group of families. Were that to happen, the implications for the future vibrancy of Jewish life would be devastating. We must respond now to prevent what would amount to a communal calamity in the future.

Both in relative and in absolute terms, the federations spend a great deal of funds on Jewish education. But it is not enough. Sadly, it is not nearly enough. Federations must look for new solutions, new ideas, new approaches and innovative thinking to thwart the insidious peril of out-of-reach tuitions. The costs to the schools of providing their services must be reduced. Only this way can tuitions be proportionately reduced, or at least capped. Our leaders must seek answers with the same energy and creative zeal they have demonstrated in relation to our important communal capital campaigns.

If we fail in this, we will fail our children and will likely face, in the years to come, the same crises of Jewish life that beset so many communities in the United States.

International response to Israel's destruction of Iraq's nuclear reactor continued to escalate. It was unanimously condemned by the UN Security Council and the United States refused to support it. ### Philanthropy

In the last few weeks, The CJN has published numerous articles that have expressed concerns about Jewish community, unity and continuity.

Such writings speak volumes to me as a Jew. My dream for the future of our people includes a strong viable Jewish presence in the world. You have pushed my thinking and offered me inspirational as well as thought-provoking words to encourage me to seriously ponder what will happen to our Jewish community when I am gone.

I am stretched to give serious, committed, and intentional thought to a very large question. What do I want to share or preserve after my lifetime? I am pushed to consider and dream about the future that I want.

And that further leads me to give serious consideration to philanthropic giving. Whether I leave $1,000 or $10,000 or $100,000 is not the issue. It is about taking responsibility to consider what legacy I want left after I am gone, both spiritually and monetarily.

The world situation reminds us on a daily basis that each and every one of us must stand up and be counted. Each and every voice matters! Your articles continue to offer me real food for thought. These words encourage and stimulate my chosen actions now.

It is incumbent on each of us to take appropriate actions now – in how we live and act day to day; in what we give back to community now; and what legacy we wish to live for future generations.

How can Israel back Abbas?

On May 25, Israeli news media reported that Israel had authorized the provision to the Fatah party, controlled by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, of weapons and munitions to fight Hamas' recent attempt to control Gaza, with control of the West Bank presumably being its next goal.

One of the conditions of the Oslo accords was that Israel would supply the Palestinian Authority with weapons and munitions to "maintain law and order" in Palestinian territory. The result of this naive generosity produced well-armed Palestinians who use Israeli weapons to fight Israelis.

But Israel may be backing the wrong horse, one that was rejected by a majority of Palestinians in an election, and shunning the legitimate victor of that vote – Hamas.

Israel's intention may be to pressure Hamas to either officially recognize Israel or to undermine its ability to govern while appearing to support the return of Abbas' corrupt regime to power. But one should not forget that Abbas' government condemned terror attacks on one hand while at the same time urging shahids (martyrs) to "continue the struggle."

If Hamas succeeds in its plan to militarily control the Palestinian territories, would Israel be the kind of partner they will want to negotiate with or even recognize? It took more than 20 years for Israel to finally receive an (albeit empty) recognition of its right to exist from Palestinians in the territories, but it came a cost: two intifadahs that killed 600 Israelis.

The recent Israeli election proved that Israelis want to end the conflict with the Palestinians. They voted in a left-leaning government that opposes the fight-to-the-end mentality of recent right-wing coalitions. But how long will Israelis support a government that won't work hard to attain peaceful coexistence with the Palestinians, whomever they elect to govern?

Response to Avi Zer-Aviv

It should not be a surprise to anyone that the reasoning used by Avi Zer-Aviv in his letter (CJN, June 15) in support of the Canadian Union of Public Employee's boycott of Israel – I refer to Israel's "illegal and hurtful actions in the West Bank and Gaza" and the "oppression of millions of Palestinians" – is in total synch with the policies of retreat, defeatism and reward of terrorism by the government of Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

Looking for her birth father

I was born in Toronto on Jan. 10, 1964, and placed for adoption. My birth father knew about me, but he was only 17 years old at the time and did not tell his parents. My father's name is Harry, I believe, and he was born in April 1946 in Germany to Jewish parents who are both Holocaust survivors. They came to Canada some time after 1946, and my father was raised in Toronto.

My mother, Rose-Marie Alyward, whom I have located, was 15 years old when I was born. She thinks my father's last name is "Kahn," but I'm not sure that's correct. My father has a sister born around 1951 and a brother born around 1958. I would be grateful if anyone with information about my father would contact me.

Is Britain Europe's most anti-Semitic country?

By MANFRED GERSTENFELD

Has Britain replaced France as Europe's most anti-Semitic and anti-Israeli country? There are many indicators that this has happened.

The number of anti-Semitic incidents in the United Kingdom in 2005 was close to that of France, where the Jewish population is twice as large as the one in Britain, which has, at most, 300,000 Jews.

The Community Security Trust, the defence body of the British Jewish community, reported 455 anti-Semitic incidents in 2005. This was 14 per cent lower than the 532 in the record year 2004. The difference can, however, be explained by the fact that two individuals in 2004 had together been responsible for 60 incidents.

> Where is the Jewish community in all this?

The year 2005 was the second in a row in which the number of violent incidents against Jewish people was greater than the number of incidents in which Jewish property was damaged. One of the most violent incidents was in Manchester, where a yeshiva student was stabbed by a man who ran after him with a knife. Another was an attack on a Jew in London by 15 youths. After the attack, they threw a liquid on him and tried to set him on fire.

In Britain, two categories of perpetrators stand out in particular: right-wing white and Middle Eastern youth. Among well-known individuals involved in anti-Semitic acts was the socialist mayor of London Ken Livingstone, who compared a Jewish journalist to a concentration camp guard, and Prince Harry, son of Prince Charles, who wore a Nazi uniform at a fancy-dress party.

Anti-Semitism and anti-Israelism flourish jointly in the United Kingdom. On May 29, the National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education (NAFTHE), one of the two university teachers unions, voted to boycott Israeli academics that do not condemn so-called Israeli "apartheid" policies. The majority of the union members were from the left.

Not a word was said about Palestinian universities, such as Gaza, Nablus and Bir Zeit, where academics promote genocide, murder and racism, and student movements compete for recognition in elections, based on, in part, which one has killed more Jews.

NAFTHE did, however, cancel the boycott on June 11, mainly because of international pressure from academic organizations.

Early in June, the Oxford Student Union (OSU) twinned with Bir Zeit University's student council. Oxford University's student newspaper claimed that student unions at Edinburgh University, the London School of Economics and Liverpool University are also twinned with Bir Zeit's student council.

It also became known that a dance journal, Dance Europe, had refused to write about Israeli choreographer Sally Ann Freedland unless she condemned Israeli government policies.

In addition, both the Anglican Church and the Church of Scotland have voted in favour of anti-Israeli measures.

This all takes place in an atmosphere where attacks on Israel are regularly made by many. British lawyer Trevor Asserson has published detailed studies on how the BBC frequently distorts its reporting from the Middle East in an anti-Israeli way.

Gerald Steinberg, a professor of political science at Bar-Ilan University, and regular CJN columnist, edits the NGO Monitor published by the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs. He has written about how the charity Christian Aid, which operates in the United Kingdom and Ireland, constantly blames Israel for Palestinian suffering, while barely mentioning Palestinian terrorism. This organization has an annual budget of $150 million (US).

[Carrie Devorah photos]

But many other anti-Israeli parliamentarians can be found, mainly among Labour and the Liberal Democrats. The British Foreign Office regularly condemns Israel when a Palestinian civilian is killed in attacks on terrorists. It remains silent about the many civilians killed by the allied forces in Iraq, of which Britain is part and for which it thus has co-responsibility.

By now, it has also become clear that Chris Patten, when he was a British commissioner in the European Union, has been a key figure in stonewalling detailed investigations of how EU money was diverted by Palestinian authorities for illicit purposes.

This is a worrisome but not a full picture. Other factors also have to be taken into account. Former Israeli ambassador Zvi Stauber says that he considers the British government, with the exception of Germany, the most pro-Israeli in western Europe. He adds, however, that opinion polls usually indicate that the number of Israel supporters in the United Kingdom is about equal to that of the pro-Palestinians.

Where is the Jewish community in all this? It attempts to fight, mainly by traditional methods, such as trying to get support from the judicial system, collaborating closely with the police in security matters, maintaining good contacts with politicians and keeping a low profile. One has to keep in mind that, as Britain was not occupied in World War II, the effects of the Holocaust are far weaker there than elsewhere in Europe.

The Jewish community's policies can only provide very partial answers to the many challenges. If one compares British Jewish leadership with that of France, it seems unimaginative. The recent problems, however, are unlikely to go away. Whether they like it or not, British Jews will have to change tactics against those hostile to Israel, exposing them far more aggressively.

Will one see a British buying spree of houses in Israel, such as the one in recent years by French Jews? That was followed by an increased aliyah as well as emigration elsewhere. It is somewhat early for that yet, but as the British situation is unlikely to get much better, we are likely to see the same phenomenon as among French Jews.

Substantial anti-Semitism and anti-Israelism are usually indicators of countries in trouble. France, where the previous socialist government consistently hid anti-Semitic violence, has by now found out that anti-Semitic violence was the beginning of the incidents that increasingly tarnish the image of the country. The autumn riots in 2005 by Muslim youths, some of whom declared that they were anti-white and anti-French, are examples of such incidents.

The major enemies of the Jews are also those of British civil society. The extreme right, still relatively weak, is troublesome through its violence against many others. The extreme left, and parts of the moderate left, undermine society in many ways. Some human rights organizations have become functional allies of potential terrorists and other murderers, by attempting to block anti-terrorism laws.

Radical Muslims, who are a problem for Jews, are also a problem for society at large, as the London suicide bombings of July 2005, in which 52 civilians were killed, have shown. The most immediate challenge for British society is likely to come from this minority, of which large parts have the impression by now that the British government will continue to cave in to their demands as it has done in the past on many occasions.

It can be concluded from the French example that, just as that country's image has become increasingly stained, Britain is next in line.

Necessary vacations

Is the best part of a vacation returning home? Some claim that the ultimate purpose of vacations is to make us appreciate our mundane lives. We need contrasts: in order to value one form of experience, we need to indulge in its antithesis. While there is an element of truth in the above, I'm not persuaded.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

Returning from a two-week vacation in Israel, I claim otherwise. While it was good to come home – to sleep in my own bed, and resume my routine – the vacation offered more than unadorned acceptance of my life.

Over the past few years, I have not been a good vacation-taker. My husband and I have been so busy that we neglected this aspect of our lives. Yes, we travelled, but always on business trips, and often not even together. (Confession: this recent vacation was also a business trip – I delivered two papers at two different conferences. Yet it was also a vacation.) Ironically, this coming home made me appreciate vacations – not just because I didn't want to go back to work. Rather, I was left with a sense of wholeness, of fulfillment and enrichment. Since marrying, my children have consistently taken frequent vacations, arguing that we should do the same. I see the wisdom of their ways.

What is a vacation? Mainly, it's a break in routine that gives us an opportunity to shift gears. When Judaism initiated the Sabbath, a weekly day off, the ancient Greeks criticized us for our laziness. On the contrary, one should argue that the Sabbath break creates a venue for more intense and dedicated work.

In our culture, it has become apparent that weekends – and not just one day off– are necessary for human activity and productivity. It's healthy to shift gears and rest regularly. A vacation manages restful time on an annual scale, opening up new possibilities and enabling all sorts of experiences. Today, many use vacation time to travel to new places, meet new people, see new sights. Others may stay home and use the time to immerse themselves in a hobby, or study, or create. Mostly, vacations are an excuse to experience some aspect of our world in a new and distinct way. And that seems to me to be a human imperative.

Vacations lead to knowledge and intense human interactions. They are socially, culturally and even economically rewarding. They are also spiritually inspiring. I don't know why this one vacation affected me so palpably. Perhaps it really has been too long. Or perhaps my own stage in life brings forth this kind of reflexivity. I do know that my husband and I spent the entire time together. A necessary good that we will do again!

Touring places where Jews once flourished

There are two great scenes in Indiana Jones and the Last Crusade with Harrison Ford. In the first, he looks out at Venice and sighs, "Ah, Venice", anticipating the amorous adventures that Venice offers. The second scene has him coming up out of a sewer pipe after escaping a fiery death and again sighing – "Ah, Venice" – but what a difference! Venice, in other words, has more than one face.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

After we leave Spain on our upcoming trip, we will travel to Venice on our way to a short cruise along the Dalmatian coast. Venice, ah Venice. The scene of The Merchant of Venice. The place that gave us the word "ghetto." The city that, rather than see her trade with the East interrupted by the also-Christian Byzantine Empire, attacked and burned Constantinople rather than complete the Crusade for which she had been hired. Venice, who ransacked Constantinople and brought home the horses that rear above St. Mark's plaza.

Venetian Jews lived there for many centuries, but only in 1516 were they confined to the ghetto. Throughout the Mediterranean area and beyond to Babylon, Jews were the trade link between the Christian West and the Muslim East, trading in spices, silks and other luxury goods that fed wealthy Christian elites. The Jew of Shakespeare's Merchant was an anti-Semitic canard that, ironically, was based on the circumstances of the later Middle Ages, when Jews were forced out of many of the trade positions they had held and were increasingly restricted to moneylending.

Venice – city of Jews, until the Nazi murderers came.

The real reason for my meditations on this vacation has to do with how we think about the destruction of European Jewry when we choose which countries to visit. That many supposed friends and neighbors joined in that destruction is perhaps the most painful part. Scholars continue to reveal the extent of the collaboration of so many ordinary citizens of every European country with Nazi extermination plans, and the paucity of Righteous Among the Nations who protected their Jewish neighbours.

So do we go to countries that participated in the murder of their Jewish citizens? Is it true, as Faulkner said, that "the past isn't over. It isn't even past?" So when is the past the past?

Throughout Europe, east and west, Jews remain an easy target when people are looking for someone to blame in times of crisis. One need look no further than Poland (and Russia), where popular opinion can always be focused on the Jews (even when there are none) as the cause of suffering.

Last month, I wrote about Spain, and the Expulsion and Inquisition. Perhaps we can look to some examples from the past in order to guide us in the future. This brings me back to the Sephardi experience.

Jewish life in Muslim kingdoms depended very much on the rulers, the climate of the times, relations between Muslim and Christian states, and the health of the economy and culture. Good times meant a good climate for Jews, bad times meant a bad climate. As Jane Gerber points out in her book The Jews of Spain, for centuries after the expulsion, Sephardim longed for the good days of Sepharad, memorializing it in poetry and maintaining their Ladino heritage. According to Gerber, many Jews would have gone back if they had been able.

But today is a different story. Jews may be going back – in small numbers – to live in Western Europe, but the great Jewish communities, outside of France, are gone. Most of us will return only as tourists.

"When I toured the ghetto," a friend of mine sighed, "the guide talked about us [the Jews] as if we were a relic from the past, all dead, no survivors. I wanted to say 'Hey, here we are! We're still here!'"

To judge change, we can go where we hope change is happening, and assert our historical connections while reminding people that, hey, we're still here and we're thriving! We can show that we're not relics of the past, but part of a vibrant and alive Jewish nation, and that – while remembering, never forgetting, what happened to us – we can give the nations that oppressed us a second chance.

CJC must return to its advocacy roots

Most people would agree that the role of the Canadian Jewish Congress is to speak for Canada's organized Jewish community on various Jewish concerns such as anti-Semitism or Israel advocacy.

Congress has another important role, however – that of supporting and advocating positions on issues that are important to all Canadians. This social activism role is vital to Canadian Jewry as it promotes the various principles and values that reflect the Jewish experience. These values have been inherited from our history as well as learned writings, the Talmud, the Torah and other sacred books that reflect the integrity of our Jewish makeup.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

Not only is it morally and ethically correct for Congress to assume the role of public advocate but also Congress has proven to be very effective in this role.

For example, in the 1980s Congress took this advocacy role seriously and, under the able leadership of law and social action committee chair, Fred Zemans, was remarkably successful in its campaigns.

Over the years, the committee advocated positions on such diverse issues as employment equity, gun control, capital punishment, immigration and refugees as well as changes to Canada's federal anti-discrimination law.

At that time, Congress also created a special committee to examine the major constitutional changes leading to the adoption of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Of all the many groups that played an advocacy role at the time, the CJC and the Canadian Bar Association were most influential in ensuring that the Charter reflected Canadian and, with respect to Congress, Jewish values throughout its text.

It was always the position of Congress that what is good for Canadian Jews is good for all Canadians and Canadian society. It is a selfless, broader perspective that reflects our Jewish values.

These efforts did not stop the same committee from also focusing on issues that were more directly Jewish, such as restrictions on the sale and importation of Pesach foods, the Jewish poor, the Jewish disabled and the sometimes improper and heavy-handed use of the get.

Sadly, this social justice agenda seems to have been placed on the back burner and Congress' advocacy role has greatly diminished over the past 20 years. With a limited budget earmarked for social advocacy, Congress is effectively eliminated and has virtually disappeared as one of the leading voices promoting Canada as a fair, just and equitable society.

It is now time to revisit this role of Congress. To be sure, there are now new issues to address, such as the role of modern technology, the globalization of trade and the world economy in general. And, of course, the old issues return to our attention from time to time.

It is true that Congress has recently addressed a number of key issues as part of its advocacy mandate. These include initiatives with Canada's aboriginal leaders. The CJC president was, in fact, the first Jewish leader ever to address the Council of the Assembly of First Nations. Similarly, other initiatives have also been taken with respect to Canada's Muslim community, organized labour and the provision of assistance to alleviate the suffering of those trapped in the Darfur turmoil. These are important issues, but there is much more to be done.

Recently appointed CEO of Congress, Bernie Farber, has begun the process of returning the CJC to its vital advocacy roots. Farber has a well-deserved international reputation as a bright, passionate and articulate advocate. Through its Ottawa office, and its director of government relations, Eric Vernon, Congress already has competent staff in place.

We should freshly examine our priorities and provide the CJC with the necessary resources so that it is not only a Jewish organization that deals with Jewish issues but is also a vital Canadian organization that ensures the Canadian experience is unique among the nations of the world. The great successes of the past should tell us that Congress has an important role to play in these matters – a role that will bring about changes to an evolving society, culture and environment.

Congress must again take up the mantle and resume its rightful place as an agent for bettering our society. Ultimately, this may prove to be the greatest and the most lasting legacy of the modern work of the CJC.

Jihadist Muslims distort Islam

The destructive, intolerant jihadist strain of Islam has been in the news of late, what with the killing of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the mastermind of Al Qaeda in Iraq, and the arrest of 17 homegrown Canadian Muslims in the Toronto area accused of plotting terrorism.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

In unsettled times like ours, it may be tempting to generalize and sweepingly condemn Islam as a religion that fosters violence. But this would be a wrong-headed, short-sighted and counter-productive approach. By lumping all Muslims into one undifferentiated mass, we run the risk of radicalizing members of that faith – the world's fastest-growing one – who abhor terrorism and seek accommodation, harmony and mutual understanding with non-Muslims.

But when we speak of Muslims who subscribe to jihadism, a virulent and combative form of Islamic fundamentalism, we enter an entirely new realm. Jihadists, be they Saudis, Iraqis, Canadians, Indonesians or Americans, are committed to the violent overthrow of the existing international system and its replacement by an all-encompassing Islamic state.

What spurs them on? Various root causes. Poverty. Backwardness. Oppressive governments. The legacy of imperialism. The Arab-Israeli dispute. The presence of western forces in the Middle East. But according to Mary Habeck, a Johns Hopkins University strategic studies professor, these factors only partially explain the zealousness of jihadists.

In an important and penetrating book, Knowing the Enemy: Jihadist Ideology and the War on Terror (Yale University Press), Habeck reminds us that radical Islam emerged centuries before the West colonized Islamic lands, and that some of its leading contemporary practitioners, from Sept. 11 ringleader Mohammed Atta to Al Qaeda's Osama bin Laden, are from prosperous backgrounds. In passing, it should also be noted that jihadism was a going concern when Israel was not even a twinkle in the eyes of even ardent Zionists.

All too often, Habeck observes, commentators and scholars ascribe the spate of terrorism since Sept. 11, 2001, to political, social or economic grievances.

As she puts it: "The consistent need to find explanations other than religious ones for the attacks says, in fact, more about the West than it does about the jihadis." In short, they have generally failed to take the religious dimension of jihadism seriously. "To see why jihadis declared war in the United States… we must be willing to listen to their own explanations."

Jihadists are crystal clear about their long-range goals, which are embedded in Islam. They advocate the destruction of the secular world as a necessary first step to creating an Islamic utopia on earth.

Although jihadists are in broad agreement about their ultimate objectives, they differ significantly on strategies to reinvigorate Islam, Habeck writes. Some jihadists are inward looking, focus on offences committed by Muslims and believe that unjust or wayward Muslim governments, or "agents of the West," should be unseated and replaced by staunchly Islamic regimes. Some others, mourning the passing of the caliphate in 1924, want to impose Islam on a global scale. Still others, such as the Sept. 11 terrorists, hold the current representatives of "unbelief" and "falsehood" – Europe, the United States and Jews – responsible for Islam's decline.

The dogmas of jihadists are known: Islam is the one true religion and must be accepted by everyone. Muslim rulers should govern by sharia, or Islamic law. Muslims are in a state of conflict with infidels, or non-Muslims.

Ibn Taymiyya, whose writings spring from the Hanabali school of Islamic jurisprudence, stated that Islam requires state power and supported armed struggle, or jihad, against anyone outside the fold of Islam. Al-Wahhab revived these tenets nearly 500 years later and cemented a fateful alliance with the House of Saud. Rida, an admirer of Wahhabism, argued that the Qur'an can define all existence.

Al-Banna, the Egyptian founder of the Muslim Brotherhood, transformed these tenets into a coherent set of beliefs about Islam, politics and warfare. Qutb, a member of the Muslim Brotherhood, wrote Milestones, a bestseller in extremist Islamic circles.

"None of these theorists could have had any impact in the Islamic world if their arguments had not found some sort of resonance in… Islam," Habeck notes.

In this connection, she suggests that they made "shrewd use" of the Qur'an and other texts to support their contention about the need for jihad.

Claiming that jihadists reinterpret and thus abuse holy texts, Habeck says that they and their supporters accept only the most literal interpretations. "All other readings are not just mistaken, they are pernicious and sinful and must be stamped out," she comments.

The majority of Muslims disagree with their view of sacred texts and Islamic law, but jihadists maintain that they hold a monopoly on the truth.

The corpse of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

To jihadists, every element of modern Western liberalism is flawed, wrong and evil. Democracy, human rights, personal freedom and international institutions are illegal, illegitimate and sinful. Western scientific ideas turning on evolution, psychology and sociology are subversive.

Concepts such as interfaith dialogue, tolerance and multiculturalism are expressly designed to reduce Muslim attachment to the umma, or Islamic community. Nationalism split Muslims into "cartoon states" and therefore weakened the Islamic world. Educational reform distorts the minds of young Muslims. Imperialism is not primarily about economic resources, control of territory or military hegemony, but about the destruction of Islam.

As the eternal enemies of Islam, Jews possess negative characteristics. They are notorious for their betrayal and treachery, have incurred God's curse and wrath and are monkeys and pigs, as Hamas spokesmen never tire of asserting.

Qutb wrote that Jews declared war on the Prophet Muhammad in Mecca and Medina, and continue to do so even now. Says Habeck of Qutb, "In his reading of the Jews today, they are exactly the same people as they were 14 centuries ago."

Jihadists believe that Israel is a latter-day Crusader state implanted by the West in Muslim territory, and that the Jewish state serves the interests of Western colonizers. Bin Laden claims that Israel and the United States are so intertwined that to talk about Israel and the Jews is to talk about America. Ayman al-Zawahiri, his deputy, has said that Israel is "a developed American military base in the heart of the Islamic world and in one of its most sacred places." As a result, the United States "must pay the price for its oppressive and brutal policy toward the Muslims, especially in Palestine."

Some jihadist organizations go as far as to say that Israel is part of a Jewish attempt to recapture territory lost by Jewish tribes in the Saudi peninsula. Many more believe that Zionism hungers for conquest throughout the Middle East. Others view the 2003 U.S. invasion of Iraq as a plot to ensure Israel's dominance in the region. Still other jihadists have internalized European anti-Semitic motifs and see Israel in control of the media, behind every war and in constant pursuit of attacking and corrupting Islam.

Habeck maintains that jihadists have twisted the meaning of jihad as it is understood within modern Islam.

As she writes: "The general Islamic understanding of jihad today is that it consists of both an internal and an external component. Believers are urged to strive for a deeper faith and to control their desires, while seeking God and the good. This internal struggle is given priority, but there is also a vision of external struggle that includes striving to make society conform to Islamic norms of justice."

But, as she adds, jihad is understood by most present-day Muslims to refer to the Prophet Muhammad's era, "a time that has come and gone. Instead, Muslims believe that the just war of jihad is defensive only, the last resort when attacked by aggressors. Jihadis have subverted this modern understanding of jihad and are attempting to win over the Muslim community to their vision of continuous warfare with the unbelievers."

In closing, Habeck offers a plausible strategy by which jihadists can be defeated. But two of the factors that engender support for the jihadist brand of Islam, autocracy and economic stagnancy, are very much alive in the Muslim world today.

Schorsch warns Conservatives about straying from Halachah

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

As he prepares to step down as chancellor of the Jewish Theological Seminary on June 30, Rabbi Ismar Schorsch warns that changes such as permitting the ordination of gays and lesbians could have dire consequences for the Conservative movement, including its demise.

"Long term, I think it would weaken considerably the commitment of the movement to a serious halachic way of life," he said in a phone interview from his New York office.

"Once the halachic moorings are loosened, there are other questions just around the corner that will force compliance from a movement that is less committed to halachah."

Rabbi Schorsch believes there is "no question" the Conservative movement will be confronted immediately with the question of patrilineal descent if it admits gay students for rabbinic ordination.

"The patrilineal question is a question of enormous relevance to a lot of Jews who are eager to see their grandchildren regarded as Jewish," he said, referring to the Jewish law that determines the Jewish status of children.

According to Halachah, or Jewish law, children are Jewish if they are born to a Jewish mother, but Judaism is not transmitted from the fathers in the same unconditional way. The Reform movement has recognized patrilineal descent as a determinant of Judaism since 1983.

Rabbi Schorsch added that if the movement approves commitment ceremonies for same-sex couples, the pressure in favour of same-sex marriages will be "enormous."

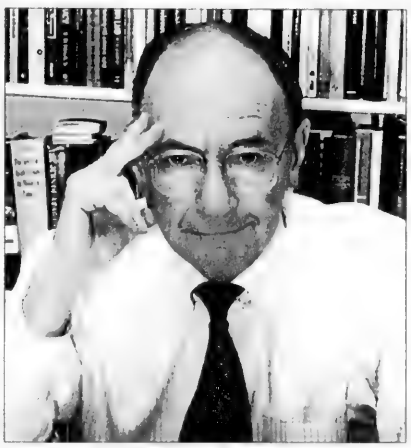
If such changes are permitted, little, if anything, would be left to distinguish Conservative Judaism from Reform, and the two movements would merge, he believes.

He thinks such a merger would be "a catastrophe" for North American Jewry, as it would diminish religious diversity. "Two religious options are far less viable than three religious options," he said.

In recent years, the Conservative movement has lost its status as the largest Jewish denomination in the United States to the Reform movement. The chancellor attributes some of the loss to secularism in society and to the notion that the requirements of Reform – such as fewer required hours of congregational school – "are deemed to be less burdensome".

A longtime proponent of Jewish education, Rabbi Schorsch noted proudly that the JTS has the largest school of Jewish education in the world with 140 full-time students preparing for careers in the field.

There has been a growth in "serious Jewish education," both formal and informal – a longtime priority of his – since Rabbi Schorsch became chancellor of the Conservative movement's flagship seminary 20 years ago. It is one of the biggest changes in the movement in recent years, he noted, citing the creation of new Schechter schools (the day schools associated with the Conservative movement) and also the growth of Conservative Judaism's Ramah camping movement.



Rabbi Ismar Schorsch

The chancellor has advocated that Jewish educational institutions admit patrilineally Jewish children up to bar/bat mitzvah age (after which they would be expected to undergo conversion to Judaism), but he does not hesitate to call intermarriage, which has risen dramatically in recent years, "a curse for the continuity of Jewish life.

"Unimpeded, it will bring to an end organized Jewish life in North America," he said.

In his address at this year's JTS commencement ceremonies, Rabbi Schorsch decried the "malaise" in Conservative Judaism today. He called the movement's new chumash, Etz Hayim: Torah and Commentary "eviscerated" and criticized the craving he said JTS students have for "instant gratification.

"With frequency, fundamental changes come more easily," he said at the commencement. "Our forebearers embraced history to enlarge and enrich Jewish observance. We wield it, if at all, to shrink it."

The speech was described in the New York Jewish Week as a "scathing attack" on both JTS students and the Conservative movement as a whole.

But Rabbi Schorsch denies that he spoke in anger. Indeed, his tone throughout his interview with The CJN was calm and reflective, befitting his background as a historian.

Scholarship, he said, has always been the core of his religious life. He will stay on at JTS as a faculty member after Arnold Eisen becomes chancellor-elect July 1. Eisen, the chair of religious studies at Stanford University, will become only the second non-rabbi to head the JTS in its 120-year history.

Rabbi Schorsch plans to spend much of his time post-retirement doing "a good deal of reading, writing and research... What nourishes me spiritually is learning and scholarship."

The strike price

Money Matters

Jay Kelman

A few weeks ago, Torontonians awoke to news that due to an (illegal) wildcat strike, there was no public transit. Under such circumstances, may other transit providers drastically raise prices, or is such behaviour nothing more than price gouging of innocents who have limited options?

The Torah prohibits one from knowingly pricing an object above its market price (ona'ah). While any amount of overcharge is prohibited, no recourse is given if the discrepancy is less than one-sixth of the price. However if the overcharge (or undercharge) exceeds one-sixth, the aggrieved party can nullify the transaction.

In the modern day economy, with so many variables – including service, convenience, location, hours of operation – influencing price, it becomes exceedingly difficult to determine an accurate market price. Nonetheless there are cases when it's clear that one is being taken advantage of, and recourse is granted. The taxi driver who takes unsuspecting tourists on a roundabout route to their destination would clearly be in violation of these laws. It would thus appear that taking advantage of those inconvenienced by the transit strike would violate Jewish law.

However, one might argue that the sharp, sudden price increases are no more than a shift in the true market price. With the demand for services remaining relatively constant, coupled with a huge drop in the supply of transportation, prices must, by necessity, increase to keep the supply and demand in balance. Our economic fortunes are often determined by items beyond our control – such is the nature of the marketplace. Helping those who have suffered due to such circumstances is not the role of the marketplace but the responsibility of our social service network, as detailed in the laws of tzedakah.

The supremacy of market forces is buttressed by the Talmud's ruling that the sale of war materials during battle is not subject to the laws of ona'ah. In such a desperate situation, the combatants are willing to pay whatever price is charged, and the inflated price becomes the new market price, representing fair value. Thus, with the TTC out of service, the "excessive" prices charged for alternate transportation represent no more than an accurate reflection of the market.

Nonetheless, it's not clear that Jewish law would allow sellers to raise prices to take advantage of such a captive market. The Talmud seems to offer a contradictory ruling about an escaping fugitive who is charged well above market price for transport, and it allows him to recover the excess fees. Taking economic advantage, even of a criminal, is unethical, despite his obvious willingness to pay any price for a ticket. It's the objective value of the trip, not the subjective desire of the criminal, that is determinative.

Many authorities assume the fugitive case is normative and reject the battlefield case as representing a minority view. Others claim that no contradiction actually exists: in the war case, combatants will pay a premium for supplies, thus the price charged is "fair." However in the case of the escaping criminal, the market price remains the same – only the criminal, due to his unique circumstances, would pay the higher (and unethical) price. Whether charging the travelling public more is analogous to charging a criminal higher price or whether it represents a changed market paradigm is open to debate.

In any event, even if taking advantage of unexpected market forces may be technically allowed, it falls short of the ethical ideal and should be discouraged. In addition, government agencies have the right to ignore such laws if they feel the public interest is best served by government intervention.

The Rescue at Entebbe, Pt. 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Thirty years ago, the world was riveted by a drama that began in the eastern Mediterranean with the hijacking of Air France Flight 139. It culminated seven days later with the spectacular rescue by the Israel Defence Forces in Entebbe, Uganda.

The best summary on the Internet of the events leading up to the raid and its successful completion was written by Reserves Maj. Louis Williams, a senior press officer for the Israel Defence Forces. Williams' "Entebbe Diary" follows in great detail the flight of the Air France jet as it took off from Ben-Gurion Airport on June 27, 1976, "on what promised to be a routine flight to Paris via Athens." Four terrorists boarded in Greece and hijacked the plane to Entebbe. In exchange for more than 100 Israeli and Jewish passengers, they demanded the release of terrorists being held in Israel, France, Germany, Switzerland and Kenya. This is a suspenseful read full of details that may have been forgotten over the years. [http://tinyurl.com/6q5qu]

"It was a daring raid even by Israeli standards," the announcer intones. To get an immediate feel of the raid and its aftermath, the History Channel site offers a dramatic audio clip that sums up the raid as well as its aftermath. "The raid was not as [then-] Ugandan President Idi Amin put it 'Zionist aggression against a free African state…' For Israel, it served as a tonic, a unifying force reminiscent of the 1967 war." [http://tinyurl.com/prlab]

The BBC site offers several video clips. These include a lengthy report from July 4, 1976, giving the initial details of the rescue as well as a very short clip with former hostage Tony Russell, who is none too pleased to be badgered by the press. [http://tinyurl.com/5eaqq] Three days later, another BBC report tells of the efforts to locate hostage Dora Bloch. Bloch, a 75-year-old British-Israeli citizen, had been taken from the airport for medical treatment before the raid. At the time, British diplomat James Hennessey hoped to get some answers from Amin. [http://tinyurl.com/mddgu] Bloch was never found and according to the BBC site, in May 1979, pathologists identified remains found near a sugar plantation 20 miles east of Kampala as those of Bloch.

One of the names most closely linked to the raid on Entebbe belongs to Jonathan Netanyahu. Born in the United States and educated there as well as in Israel, "Yoni" was a veteran of the 1967 Six Day War. Netanyahu led the storming party to free the hostages at Entebbe and was the lone Israeli military casualty.

Visitors to the recently redesigned official site dedicated to the memory of Yoni are greeted by this verse from 2 Samuel 1:25, "How the mighty have fallen in battle! Jonathan lies slain on your heights." The fully bilingual site includes a biography, photographs and Yoni's battle record as well as a summary of the Entebbe rescue. Visitors to the site can also "light" memorial candles and leave a note with their thoughts. Dan recently wrote, "I fight in the military engineering unit and am in a captain's course at the moment. The story of Yoni, may his memory be blessed, inspires me with great pride and admiration." [www. yoni.org.il/]

From his early teens, Netanyahu wrote letters to relatives and friends, which were collected and published after the raid. Self Portrait of a Hero is still in print and was reviewed several years ago by the Boston Globe: "Yoni's unpretentious accounts of his accomplishments, simply written and thus the more grand, make him the convincing hero he was and make us wish that more like him were among us." [www.israel books.com/bookDetails.asp?book=45]

On the fateful day of the hostages' liberation, then-Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin addressed the Knesset. "The Israel Defence Forces have achieved one of their most exemplary victories from both the human and moral and the military-operational points of view, a remarkable manifestation of Jewish fraternity and Israeli valour… The operation that rescued our dear ones from captivity will be a subject for research, for song and for legend, and it will be written about in the annals of the nation." [http://tinyurl.com/qc2pt]

Next week, the legacy of the rescue at Entebbe.

Everyone's a winner at the Amazing Tzedakah Race

B'nai Tzedek Youth Philanthropy Program teaches youngsters about giving back

By CARLA LANCIT
UJA Federation

When Hannah Davis had her bat mitzvah in December, she knew she wanted to donate the money she received to charity, but she didn't know which one to choose.

Instead of choosing from a multitude of worthy causes, the 13-year-old Leo Baeck student decided to start a philanthropy fund through the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, UJA Federation's endowment arm. "This means that for the rest of my life I can always give money to charity," she says.

In fact, any youngster wanting to start their own tzedakah fund at the Jewish Foundation can do so for as little as $1,000.

Davis was one of the teens who participated in the recent Amazing Tzedakah Race, a fun afternoon designed to teach teens how to allocate money to different agencies and programs. The participants, who ranged in age from 12 to 17, all have tzedakah funds administered through the Jewish Foundation's Bar and Bat Mitzvah Program. Approximately $220,000 has been allocated to the program by the 40 teen participants.

Divided into four teams, the teens raced from the Lipa Green Building for Jewish Community Services on Bathurst north of Sheppard, to the Bernard Betel Centre for seniors at Steeles and Bathurst, then on to Reena, which assists the developmentally delayed on Clark Avenue in Thornhill, the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre also at Bathurst and Sheppard and an Israel-style stop where Israel projects and programs were presented, also at the Lipa Green Building. At each stop they learned about the particular agency, took a tour, completed a task, and presented a cheque. The first team to finish received an additional $200 to allocate to the program of its choice.

"I really enjoyed it," says Orli Matlow, a 12-year-old student at United Synagogue Day School (USDS). "I liked going to Reena and meeting the kids involved. I liked visiting the places."

"I got to see firsthand what they do," says Andrew Richler, a 14-year-old student at Associated Hebrew School. "I could relate to it more now that I've seen it. It's good to see where the money goes and how it helps people, and where it's most important."

During the afternoon the teens distributed $1,000, provided by Gerry and Shelley Richler through their Endowment Fund at the Jewish Foundation.

"One day this generation is going to be making the choices of where to allocate the community's money," says Richler. "The more educated they are at an earlier age, the better equipped they will be to make those decisions."

The participants are already learning how difficult it can be to allocate funds. "They all seem like good causes, and sometimes you feel bad if you're giving to one charity over another," says Jeffrey Hendler, a 15-year-old student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT). "They'll all probably use the money well so it's tough to decide where it should go."

Challenges aside, Hendler is unreserved in encouraging future b'nei mitzvah to participate in the program. "This way they have a chance to choose where the money should go, and have a chance to be part of the Jewish community."

"If you start when you're younger the chances of continuing to give charity are stronger," says Hendler. "It's a good habit to get into and there's no reason to wait. The earlier you start the more help you can be."

Volunteer makes Walk sizzle

As UJA Federation Walk with Israel participants finished their trek on May 28, and entered Ontario Place for the RioCan Carnival, most of the day's 15,000 tired and hungry walkers were met by a committed troop of volunteers. If there was a certain efficiency with which they slung hotdogs and served up drinks, it's for good reason–most of them have been working together for many years.

It all started 17 years ago when UJA Federation of Greater Toronto asked Arthur (Rosy) Rosenzweig of St. Clair Ice Cream to provide a refrigerated truck for the barbecue. Once he was there, Rosenzweig decided to make himself useful. He must've done a good job, because the next year he was asked to take charge. He's run the barbecue ever since.

Arthur (Rory) Rosenzweig

Preparations for the event start in late winter when the donations start to come in. "All the food that's either bought or donated comes to my warehouse," says Rosenzweig. Donations come from companies such as Matax Express Limited, Morgan Scott, Reliable Food Supplies, Sobeys (Clark & Hilda), Super Puff Snack Corp., Strubs, and GMB.

On the day of the Walk, Rosenzweig has three trucks on the road and up to 40 people working at the barbecue. "The crew primarily consists of my friends," he says. "Most of us live in Thornhill, and go to Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto synagogue (BAYT), but a few are from down south as well."

At the event, the volunteers work non-stop–cooking and serving between 3,500 and 4,000 hot dogs, and 500 veggie dogs along with drinks and snacks. "It's a group effort," says Rosenzweig. "After all these years they know what they're doing."

It has been predominantly the same crew for 17 years. "We've all aged together," says Rosenzweig. "The same people do all the same functions–the same people are the barbecuers every year, the same people serve."

Rosenzweig and his family intend to be involved for some time to come. His wife and children and their spouses are also involved in the event–even his young grandchildren hang out at the barbecue.

While the barbecue raises funds for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, "the main thing about the walk is not the money it raises," says Rosenzweig. "It's awareness of the need to support the Jewish community and to definitely support Israel."

Discovering Djerba, Paris and our global Jewish family

UJA Federation's recent mission to Djerba and Paris, organized by the Board of Jewish Education, offered participants exposure to the world's oldest existing Jewish community in Djerba and to the troubled Jews of Paris who are confronting regular outbreaks of anti-Semitism. In this edition of Perspective, Dr. Seymour Epstein, UJA Federation's senior vice president for Jewish Education and Identity, examines the Paris portion of the mission.

By DR. SEYMOUR EPSTEIN
UJA Federation

I organized this adventure for CHAVON – a UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education initiative that explores innovative ideas in the field of Jewish education – and for other like-minded souls so as to further investigate both the history and current manifestations of Jewish education. This introductory note should set the scene.

It is a story from my first years in North Africa as a JDC (American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee – a UJA Federation partner organization) pedagogic consultant. The head of Habad operations for France and North Africa was a certain Rabbi Benjamin Gorodetsky, of blessed memory. He told me that the first time he visited Djerba in the early fifties, he noted that children of different ages were all in the same classroom. He asked if he could show the teachers how classes are formed in the West. With permission, he sorted the young boys by age, and assigned a teacher to each group. He was complimented, but it was pointed out that a few changes needed to be made, and by the time the shuffling ended, the boys were as mixed in age as before. Baffled, Rabbi Gorodetsky asked for an explanation. He was told that a certain boy had to be with a certain teacher because his father studied with that teacher's father and his grandfather learned under that teacher's grandfather. And so it was with every child until the age chaos was restored. Gorodetsky, in telling me the story, turned at this point with a smile and said, "Maybe they were right and we have it all wrong."

Dr. Seymour Epstein in Paris

The traveler to a foreign culture brings not only his/her own suitcase, but also attitudes, expectations, and prejudices. The trick is to leave most of that in the hotel room and observe with an open mind and heart. Just imagine for a moment how the people you are visiting would visit you.

We spent Friday and Shabbat in Paris on our way home, and used the opportunity to experience Jewish Paris and to learn more about the current situation facing Jews in France.

In Paris, we visited the Alliance Israelite Universelle and met with its director, Jean-Jacques Wahl, whose opinions on the current wave of anti-Semitism were guardedly optimistic, an attitude that some of our group found difficult to fathom. Had we had more time in France, I am certain we would have heard a broad spectrum of opinions, ranging from hysteria to indifference, based on differences in location, education, and socio-economic levels.

Friday night we prayed Kabbalat Shabbat at the grand synagogue on Rue Buffault, a Sephardic synagogue built before the mass immigration of North African Jews to France, but now mainly supported by those very Jews from Morocco, Algeria, and Tunisia.

While Shabbat was a free day for the mission, some of us attended morning services at the Rue de la Victoire Ashkenazi synagogue. Here we saw the remnants of a once-thriving community celebrating a bar mitzvah in the cathedral-like grandeur of an enormous shul with pitiful attendance and the sad ignorance of Jews totally illiterate of their rich culture.

The single thing that moved me most on this mission was how, in an instant, our urban and sophisticated Jews of Toronto could identify with the Jews of a tiny village on an island in the Mediterranean and see them as brothers and sisters of the same big family. The Jews of Djerba know nothing about the greatest and most powerful Diaspora that ever existed, that of North America. They might even giggle about some of the things we hold dear. But they too see in us family, bound together by the spirit of Jewish peoplehood and their sense of God's order. I think we all grew as Jews on this trip and added significantly to both our knowledge and sentiments about the vast riches of Jewish heritage.

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

While many of us are in the midst of planning our summer getaways, the chairs of UJA Federation Campaign 2007 Ariella Rohringer and Fred Waks are working diligently on the campaign, which will officially launch on September 6.

The campaign is focusing on four urgent needs that require significant new funding:

- Combating poverty - disrupting a cycle of poverty for Toronto's 20,000 Jewish poor.
- Providing hope for Israel's youth at risk through social and educational opportunities for children challenged by poverty, parental problems, special needs or unhealthy lifestyles.
- Strengthening Jewish roots by fortifying Jewish ties for our young people, newcomers to the community and those who are living on the fringes of Jewish life.
- Bringing Ethiopian Jews home to Israel - helping up to 20,000 Ethiopians fulfill their lifelong dream of settling in Israel and meeting their absorption challenges.

Additional funds raised during Campaign 2007 will supplement low incomes for the Jewish poor to help them live in stable homes in Jewish neighbourhoods; fund services such as tutoring, JCC memberships and camp subsidies so that children who live in economically distressed homes can live like other kids, and subsidize nutritious kosher hot meals for Jewish seniors.

"We want to make every effort to eradicate poverty in Israel and in our own community," says Rohringer who, along with Waks, recently took part in a fact-finding mission to Israel. "It is deplorable that one in three Israeli children lives below the poverty line and that 20,000 Toronto Jews - ten percent of our community - live below the poverty line as well. Our dollars provide the opportunity to make a difference, to help those in need steer their lives down the road of self-sufficiency with additional dignity."

In order to provide new hope for Israeli youth at risk, additional Campaign 2007 contributions will support a range of initiatives, including fund after-school centres that provide healthy meals and productive activities for Israeli youngsters after the short Israeli school day ends at 1:00 p.m. Without after-school programs, thousands of young people would have no place to go while their parents work.

(Inset) Campaign 2007 will focus on creating opportunities for those at risk in Toronto and Israel.*

The expansion of programs offered by Hillel on university and college campuses – particularly those in outlying areas of Greater Toronto – is among several ways in which Campaign 2007 will help to strengthen Jewish roots.

Campaign 2007 funds will also be allocated toward aliyah for 20,000 Ethiopians who long to live in Israel, for which they've yearned all their lives. Additional donations will go toward their daily living expenses as they wait to leave for Israel, the cost of their flights and for absorption once they arrive. With 72% of Ethiopian families living below the poverty line, funds will also support programs like Gearing-Up-for-Success, which offers them the path to employment through job training; and Project OFEK, a program which provides Ethiopian-Israeli high school students with academic tutoring so they can pass their matriculation exams.

"Just like my parents and my husband's parents, Ethiopian olim, Russian olim, and many others arrive in Israel every week to start a new life. Through Campaign 2007, we will help these incredible people improve their lives by changing their challenges into opportunities," says Rohringer.

"Campaign 2007 is about providing people in need with the tools and the resources to place their lives on a fresh footing, with options that do not currently exist," says Waks. "It's about the realities of life which sometime befall us. It's about that single mother in Toronto with little disposable income trying to raise two or three children in a Jewish neighbourhood. For this mom, providing opportunities means job training from UJA Federation's partner agencies. It also means a wide range of counseling and financial services, including subsidies for Jewish education and Jewish camping. It's about giving these families a chance to live a normal life."

Torontonian helps Israeli citizens with special needs

Getting around Israel's southern most city of Eilat and neighbouring Eilot region will now be easier for seniors with mobility problems and kids with physical disabilities thanks to a donation by Toronto's Joseph Kostman.

Kostman donated a wheelchair accessible vehicle to Eilat-Eilot, which are twinned with Toronto through UJA Federation's Partnership 2000 (P2K) initiative.

"There are quite a number of people who really are in great need of some form of transportation," says Kostman, 90. "It's a tremendous hardship for them not to have something at hand so they can attend functions or classes."

Joseph Kostman

One man already benefiting from Mr. Kostman's generosity is 84 year old Avihu Nelson, who was born in Israel and has lived in the Eilat-Eilot area for 51 years with his 75 year-old wife.

"The vehicle is wonderful for golden-agers and people in wheelchairs who can't get around on their own," says Nelson. "Without the vehicle many of us would be housebound. But now, seniors from the region are taken to the club for the elderly where we enjoy different activities. I've just taken up woodworking. On Sundays and Wednesdays we eagerly wait for the vehicle to pick us up."

"This special-needs vehicle has brought about a revolution in our way of thinking and the services that the Regional Council provides to residents with special needs," says Udi Gat, Chairman of the Eilot Regional Council. "It enables them to participate in events that cater to their specific needs as well as events for all local residents. It is also a factor that encourages others to join the Arava residents."

Kostman grew up in an Orthodox Jewish household in Vancouver, but became estranged from his Jewish identity in adulthood. "I really didn't become a Jew per se until I came to Toronto," he says.

Kostman has also donated vehicles to other organizations such as York University, United Way, Reena and Circle of Care.

"My late wife Rachel and I have no heirs," he says. "We wanted to be able to contribute something that was more or less unique, that no one else had done. We thought about vehicles. We started with one—it was so well received that it became the pattern."

Kostman finds the act of donating the vehicles extremely satisfying. "The accomplishment of having completed each project has given me a good feeling in regards to what I've done," he says. "I feel I've done something worthwhile. My greatest regret is that I have not been able to do more."

Associated principal retires after two decades

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

For the past two decades, Rabbi Pinchas Tessler has been a Judaic studies principal at Associated Hebrew Schools, where his students are almost the age he was when he decided to become a teacher.

Back in Grade 6 or 7, when he was growing up in Holon, Israel, the future rabbi had a teacher by the name of Eliezer Tauber, a Viennese-born Holocaust survivor. "It was just amazing to see what the man was doing, his knowledge, his organizational skills and his devotion to his students," recalled Rabbi Tessler in an interview last week, after he was honoured on his upcoming retirement at Associated's Kamin Educational Centre in Thornhill. He has been principal there since 1998.

"I think that, because of [Tauber,] I probably decided to join the cadre of teachers."

After receiving his degree in education from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Rabbi Tessler, who also served as a lieutenant in the IDF's artillery forces during the Six-Day War, taught at an evening school for young immigrants who worked during the day.

"It gave me a great deal of satisfaction to know that the law in Israel was flexible and would allow these children to get an education." That stint was where his love of teaching began, he said.

A native of Romania, Rabbi Tessler has vivid memories of travelling to Palestine as a six-year-old in 1946 on an overcrowded fishing boat. His family had survived the war by relocating to a larger city. Their subsequent move to Israel fulfilled a longtime dream for his late father, Alter Shlomo, who became a founder of Shikun Vatikim synagogue in Holon.

Rabbi Tessler's wife Miriam, who was born in Hungary and raised in Montreal, claims responsibility for their move to Canada in 1967, 1½ years after their marriage. "I'm the culprit," she said jokingly, referring to her desire as an only child to spend a few years in the same city as her parents.

Her husband, she added, "was always eager for new experiences."

The couple, now parents and grandparents of a large extended family, met when Miriam, who is a secretary at Ulpanat Orot, was visiting family in Israel: her future in-laws were neighbours of her aunt and uncle.

Rabbi Tessler – who was not yet a rabbi; he would be ordained by Montreal's former chief rabbi, the late Rabbi Pinchas Hirschsprung – became principal of Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem's congregational school on his arrival in Montreal. At the same time, he studied for a master's degree at McGill University, eventually transferring to Concordia University. After two years he became principal at Herzliah High School.

He continued to teach in the classroom as well as being an administrator, and also taught at two Jewish teachers' seminaries, as he had in Israel.

After he moved to Toronto in 1985 to become Judaic studies principal at Associated's Danilack Education Centre on Leslie Street, Rabbi Tessler taught for about 15 years at the Midrasha L'Morim run by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Board of Jewish Education.

Last year he was honoured by Beth Chabad Israeli Community Centre for his work in adult education there.

Rabbi Pinchas Tessler

Among his lessons for aspiring teachers, he says that a lesson will be productive if it is "properly prepared, and challenging." Also, he added, students must feel their teachers know them and care for them as human beings.

Similarly, he believes in making Jewish studies "personal" and "alive" for students; relating prayer to real-life situations, for example.

"It doesn't matter what background you come from," he said. "All human beings have the same needs."

Paul Penna gala honours Giller prize founder

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Many of the Canadian cultural and political icons in the audience at the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School's (DJDS) recent gala tribute were as high profile as the performers on stage at the Al Green Theatre.

The annual event honoured school grandparent and philanthropist Jack Rabinovitch, founder of the Scotiabank Giller Prize for Canadian fiction, for his contributions to arts, literature and the community. The evening drew a who's who of Canadian culture to pay tribute to Rabinovitch, including publisher Anna Porter, National Post columnist Robert Fulford, social activist June Callwood, CBC radio host Andy Barrie and former TVO chair Isabel Bassett.

Other notable Canadians, including former Ontario premier Bob Rae and his wife Arlene Perly Rae and writer Morley Torgov, roasted and toasted Rabinovitch on a video produced by filmmaker Karen Shopsowitz.

Rabinovitch accepted the accolades with a brief speech in praise of multiculturalism. He talked about growing up in a multi-ethnic community in downtown Montreal, where he and other immigrant kids from diverse backgrounds sought to fit into Canadian society while still retaining the values of their respective heritages.

"The [Jewish] cultural traditions of 5,000 years ago makes you a better Canadian, and it makes for a better Canada. That's what this school [the DJDS] is all about," he said.

The event's parent co-chairs, Rabinovitch's daughter Noni Rabinovitch and Aviva Rajsky, said the gala raised $130,000 for the school.

Now housed in the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, the DJDS opened with three grades in 1998. Today, it has 100 children and is opening a middle school next fall.

The entertainment was put together by school parents, many of whom are artists in their own right. They included Columbus Theatre co-director Leah Cherniak, the gala director; Juno-award-winning music producer Danny Greenspoon, the gala producer; and actor/director Alon Nashman, the artistic director.

Rabinovitch, father of three daughters – Noni, Daphna and Elana Rabinovitch – and grandfather of two, established the annual Giller Prize in 1994 in memory of his wife Doris Giller, a journalist who died of cancer in 1993. Now known as the Scotiabank Giller, the annual $40,000 prize for the best Canadian book of fiction is the richest literary award in Canada.

Girls high school holds first tribute dinner

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

To celebrate the purchase of a permanent building on Storomont Avenue, Tiferes Bais Yaakov, the Daniel T. Gordon High School for Girls, held its first tribute dinner recently.

Danny Gordon

The gala, attended by some 600 people, was held at the Beth Avraham Yoseph Synagogue of Toronto.

The girls' school opened its doors seven years ago with 20 students, said Simi Grosman, president of its board of directors. This year, it had 85 students, "and we are growing every year," she added.

The evening was dedicated to the memory of Danny Gordon, a lawyer who died two months before his 57th birthday. The school is named in his memory.

"When Danny was approached by the original group of parents for advice and guidance, he recognized the need for Tiferes Bais Yaakov in the community," Grosman said.

"Although Danny's children were grown, he became passionately committed to the vision of offering young women in our community an intellectually challenging academic environment, both in general and Jewish studies within an atmosphere of caring, concern and trust and where each student can reach her full potential and capacity for absorbing a true sense of Torah."

Gordon was born and raised in Toronto. He attended Associated Hebrew Schools, the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and Ner Israel Yeshiva. He was the third generation of his family dedicated to Torah education in Toronto. His grandfather, Rabbi Jacob Gordon, who arrived here in 1904 from Volozhin, was spiritual leader of several shuls and a pioneer in Jewish education.

His father Wilferd, a respected lawyer, and mother Balfoura, a school trustee, were also devoted to both secular and religious education.

The evening honored the school's principal, Rabbi Yitzchak Feigenbaum, "who has a shared vision and partnership with the goals of the creators of the school," Grosman said.

Rabbi Feigenbaum was born in Cleveland. After studying at Yeshivas Mir in Jerusalem, he helped found Yeshiva DarcheiNoam/Shupell College of Jewish Studies in Israel for university-age students with little formal education. He and his family moved to Toronto in 1987. He taught at several schools before accepting the position at Tiferes Bais Yaakov.

Grosman said two classes have already graduated from the school, and its alumnae have been accepted at the finest seminaries in Israel and at prestigious North American universities.

The evening's keynote speaker was Rabbi Yissocher Frand, who is known for his popular weekly shiur in Baltimore and is the author of four books.

Occupation 'hollows out Israel', peace activist says

By JENNA ROSMAN
CJN Intern

"An occupation is an occupation is an occupation. That means brutal military rule," American-Israeli leftist and peace activist Reuven Kaminer told an audience of about 40 people at the Winchevsky Centre earlier this month.

The Detroit-born Kaminer is the author of the 1995 book The Politics of Protest: The Israeli Peace Movement and the Palestinian Intifada and the founder and editor of the Hebrew-language news and commentary website Haggadah Hasmolit (the Left Bank).

"Three-and-a-half million Palestinians have been subjected [to the occupation] since 1967. For 39 years, the situation has gone on and on. It encourages hopelessness and despair, but it does not stop the Palestinian struggle against [oppression]," he said.

Kaminer, the grandfather of Matan Kaminer, who was jailed for refusing to serve in the Israeli army, said that if Israel doesn't find a way to end to the occupation, it "will bring about the total end of Israel and break down the life and pulse of the Jewish people."

He said the only viable solution to the Israel-Palestinian conflict is a two-state solution. To achieve that, Israel must return to its 1967 borders, and the Palestinians "must be able to establish their capital in Jerusalem, next to Israel."

As well, he said, there needs to be a change in "mediation to solve the Palestinian refugee problem."

In addition, Kaminer, a founding member of far-left political group SIAH (the New Israeli Left) and a member of Peace Now, said that Palestinian leaders need to agree on a plan for dealing with Israel.

Hamas actually "wants a deal" for a two-state solution, as does its rival, Fatah, he said.

He added that Israel can't succeed in "suppressing the need of Palestinians for self-determination" and has been "unable to suppress Palestinian nationalism."

But Kaminer said Palestinians also need to understand that "returning all Arab land is also a dead dream."

He fully supports boycotts and sanctions against Israel.

"Any non-violent activity against the occupation is just and should be supported," he said. "Millions of Palestinians suffer in intolerable circumstances, despite trying to live. I would even support violent action."

Kaminer said Israel's "wall" between itself and Palestinian areas "snakes" into Palestinian life. He called it a "racist entity in the Middle East."

"They say it will keep out terror, but terror turns around and goes somewhere else," he said.

"I've [talked] about how to go from here to here. The moral issues are clear. The political issues are dense," he said.

"There is day-to-day persecution of Palestinians. There are checkpoints where Palestinians cannot pass. Palestinians are killed without legal basis. It hollows out Israel."

Help available to fill out Yad Vashem forms

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

In response to a worldwide appeal from Yad Vashem to add names to its database of Holocaust victims, Jewish Information Service of Greater Toronto (JIST) is offering free weekly clinics to those who need help completing the forms.

Trained volunteers at the clinics, held every two weeks at Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, will help people complete the forms, called the Pages of Testimony, and show them the database and its features.

The Pages of Testimony section of the website (www.yadvashem.org) includes specific information on the Jews who died during the Holocaust. Each page records the victim's full name, date and place of birth, place of residence before the war, profession, parents' and spouse's names, and the circumstances of death, as well as the name of the person who submitted the information. A photograph is included if available.

Barbara Barak, senior co-ordinator of JIST, said, "It's a race against time. Holocaust survivors may not be able to share their memories later on. It's important that we gather the names of as many of the victims as possible in order to honour, memorialize and preserve their legacies."

Fran Augenblick, a JIST staff member who works at the clinic, says that when it first opened in early May, a woman came in with 11 names.

"We could tell that it was very difficult for her, but she wanted to make sure the names got recorded.

"One man came in and talked to us for two hours. He has told his story many times, but he needed us to listen," she says.

The forms can be filled out at home by going to the website, she says, "but we are here for those who have no access to a computer."

If people have pictures, staff can scan them in order for them to be added to the database, Augenblick says.

For information about dates and times of the clinic, call JIST at 416-635-5600 or e-mail jinfo@ujafed.org.

Torontonian wins prestigious scholarship

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Jason Rotstein is one of 20 students to win the prestigious Commonwealth Scholarship this year, and he's getting set to start a master's program in critical and creative writing at the University of Sussex in October.

The scholarship will cover tuition for the one-year program, as well as travel costs, living expenses and a 600-pound monthly stipend.

The Commonwealth Scholarship and Fellowship Plan, established in 1959, was designed by Commonwealth governments to enable deserving students to pursue studies in Commonwealth countries such as Britain, Canada, Australia and New Zealand.

Rotstein, 21, just finished a degree in English and comparative literature at Cornell University, specializing in Hebrew and German literature.

He had a 3.9 cumulative grade point average, but he did more than just get good grades. He was one of the founding editors of two student journals – Yalla: A Reflection of the Middle East and Gam Yachad: A Youth Response to the Crisis in Israel, which featured poems, fiction, essays and photos.

Jason Rotstein

Both were literary journals, but each had a distinct theme.

"Gam Yachad was an all-Jewish effort and Yalla had Arab and Jewish voices. At the time, [Yalla] was the first journal in North America to bring together Arabs and Jews," he said.

Rotstein also worked as a tutor and a teaching intern, as well as researching articles for American Spectator and Inside Magazine at the Washington Post, and freelancing for The CJN.

He received 15 fellowships and awards, including one in recognition of his work with Yalla.

Rotstein said he first heard of the Commonwealth Scholarship through a woman he was dating who really wanted to win it. But he was more interested in applying for what he thought were more prestigious awards, such as the Rhodes Scholarship or the Marshall Scholarship.

"I applied for the Commonwealth Scholarship as an afterthought," he said, adding that he was very surprised and honoured to be one of the winners.

The entire application process was completed online and included writing a letter to the British government, listing some of his accomplishments and making a promise that once he finishes his program, he'll return to Canada to work, said Rotstein, who was born in the United States but grew up in Toronto.

Although his post-secondary education and extracurricular activities have focused on writing and literature, he said writing didn't always come naturally to him.

"I was never really a good student growing up... In Grade 9, I was probably the worst English student in my high school. I was very nervous and anxious about some of the grammatical elements in my writing, but now, I really feel that my writing has become automatic. I'm not really thinking about it so much," he said.

He added that after having completed a degree in English and comparative literature, and once he has obtained his master's in creative and critical writing, he'll feel as trained as a writer can be, which will free him to explore other academic avenues.

"I thought about doing a PhD in intellectual history and political thought at Cambridge [University]," but financing that level of education is greatly dependent on being awarded more scholarships, he said.

"I eventually want to go to law school. I'm actually very interested right now in art law, corporate law and international law," he added, noting that law school would also be a financial burden.

"I'm working on a number of book projects right now, so hopefully that will pay for that. I'm trying to get my thesis published," he said, noting that he received a grant from Cornell to travel to Windsor, Ont., to interview Canadian author Alistair MacLeod for his thesis, titled Only Time Can Tell: Canonization and Expressions in Time in Alistair MacLeod's Island: The Collected Stories.

He said his parents are nervous because Brighton, where the University of Sussex is located, is notorious for being a party town, but he is excited about the opportunity to grow and gain new experiences.

"You want to be influenced by your experience, and I'm one of those people who think they can be transformed by another person and is open to being transformed," he said.

'I am following my dream'

"She became my teacher when I was 10, and I still train with her. She could see I was driven, and she encouraged me to become a [classical] ballet dancer."

She knew she made the right decision about dancing with the Israel Ballet when she met the dance company's co-founder and co-artistic director, Berta Yampolsky, who was once a prima ballerina with the Odessa State Ballet.

"She went out of her way to make sure I was comfortable," Oberman says. "She is warm and kind, and ensures that there is no competition among the peers. They are like family to each other. There is so much happiness in the field of art in Israel."

Dancing is a lifestyle, Oberman says.

"When I take a day off, I feel it. I take a 1½-hour class every day, and if I'm in a performance, I have a rehearsal," she says.

"I also make sure I never eat too much. I eat a little bit at a time whenever I'm hungry because that is lighter on the stomach. To dance, I need to be thin, but I also need to be healthy and powerful."

When she dances, she says, she speaks through her body.

"I convey a message [with my movements.] I don't need to speak because the audience can see how I feel."

Dina Gidron, regional director of the Israel Aliyah Centre, which is affiliated with the Jewish Agency for Israel, says it's amazing to see how birthright israel can give young Jews such a strong connection with Israel.

"[Lisa] fell in love with Israel, and then she honed into her real passion. I give credit to birthright."

Oberman says that by making aliyah, "I am following my dream. There are not a lot of teens in the ballet world, but I am committed.

"I'm also committed to living in Israel. When I walk around there I feel no fear. There is a sense of security there."

Palais Royale, a fresh venue for a new generation

Historic Palais Royale renovated

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Everything old is new again.

The Palais Royale, a dance hall on the shore of Lake Ontario that featured many of the great big bands in the 1930s, '40s and '50s, including Benny Goodman, the Dorsey Brothers, Duke Ellington and Cab Calloway, has been renovated.

The Palais was built in 1922 as part of the Sunnyside Amusement Park and originally operated at as a boat-building factory. In 1932, it became a dance hall.

The hall, which will host private, communal, corporate and commercial events, has retained its original grandeur. The renovation takes advantage of the building's unique waterfront location and gardens, but many of the hall's historic features the beauty of yesteryear – have been retained.

Narrowly escaping demolition in 1955, the Palais Royale was leased to the Polish National Union. In 2000, the City of Toronto regained control of the Palais Royale. It was then leased to Pegasus Corp. and Borg Entertainment. More than $3 million has been spent on the renovation.

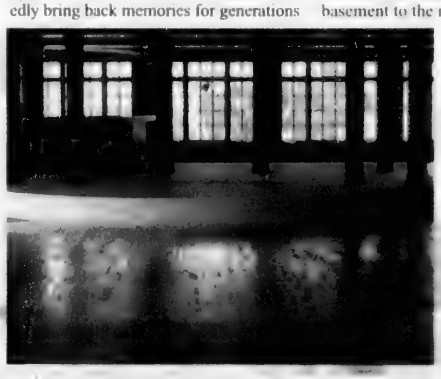
The renovated Palais Royale officially opened its doors in June. It will undoubtedly bring back memories for generations of individuals who will recall the popular destination for boy-meets-girl dances as well as bring back memories for the thousands who frequented the boardwalk, Sunnyside Pool and the surrounding gardens.

The building's external façade has been retained, but the interior – including its timbers, a retro dance floor (the hall is famous for its sprung hardwood dance floor) and a large bandstand – has been restored. The Palais' facilities include modern sound technology, visual and audio equipment and a state-of-the art kitchen that can accommodate supervised kosher events.

"We will be bringing back original events such as swing dinners and dances, as well as maintaining the fabulous concert venue reputation that the Palais Royale already has," says Mary Lou Borg, who with her brothers Joseph, Ron and Mike operates the Palais.

The Borgs are working with Terry Tsianos, president and CEO of the Pegasus Group, and John Dagonas, president and CEO of Duron Ontario, a construction company. Tsianos served as president of the Hellenic Heritage Foundation.

"The building [the Palais] was in terrible shape," says Mary Lou Borg. "We have worked closely with the Heritage Board, renovating the building from the basement to the roof."



Palais Royale's dance floor and stage

On a tour of the building, we viewed an Art Deco-inspired parlour, a lounge and Palais Royale's spectacular ballroom with its view of the lake. There is a walkout to a covered deck and patio courtyard.

For more information, call 416-533-3553, e-mail info@palaisroyale.ca or visit www.palaisroyale.ca.

Montrealer pleads guilty to spreading hate on Web

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A Montreal man faces up to two years in prison after pleading guilty in Quebec Court to wilfully promoting hatred through a racist Internet site that he created and managed.

Jean-Sebastien Presseault, 29, expressed admiration for Adolf Hitler and right-wing extremist Timothy McVeigh, who was executed for the 1995 Oklahoma City bombing, and hostility to blacks and Jews on the site, www.hatecore88wp.cjb.net.

Its 50 pages were filled with hate literature, derogatory humour, violent video games and symbols of racism such as swastikas. Music that incited hatred could also be downloaded from the site.

The "88" in the site's name is code for "hate" which rhymes with eight, and the "wp" stands for white power.

Presseault's sentencing hearing is scheduled for November.

Crown prosecutor Nadine Naviernick said it was the first time that the Montreal prosecutor's office had pursued a case under article 319 of the Criminal Code of Canada, which deals with hate propaganda.

Police discovered the website in 2003 after seizing material found in the car of a U.S. man who was refused entry into Canada because of his association with fascism. After being under police surveillance for six months, Presseault was arrested in December 2003. He was living on welfare at the time.

A search of his home uncovered various items associated with fascism and the extreme right. The investigation, however, did not link him to any particular organization, Alain Alarie, a Sûreté du Quebec officer who specializes in hate crimes, testified.

Presseault's lawyer, Gilles Fontaine, argued Canadian courts have no jurisdiction because the site was hosted in the United States. He said the type of expression on the site is tolerated there due to more permissive laws on freedom of speech.

(In a policy statement, CJB Management, Inc. says cjb.net may only be used for lawful purposes and that it reserves the right to refuse or discontinue service to "anyone for any reason at our sole discretion," or remove any material it deems unacceptable. It claims no liability for how its services are used.)

Presseault is also facing charges of making death threats against a judge and possessing illegal arms.

B'nai Brith Canada described the case against him as a "landmark" because it demonstrates that the justice system is prepared to vigorously pursue Internet hate.

"The results achieved by the Montreal Crown prosecutor's office send a clear message that use of the Internet to spread messages of hate will not be tolerated by the Quebec justice system," said Allan Adel, national chair of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights.

Jewish, non-Jewish CUPE members join picket

Indeed, every few minutes, cars would drive by the picket outside CUPE Ontario's offices at the corner of Milner Avenue and Markham Road, honking their horns in support of rescinding Resolution 50, which in turn elicited cheers from picketers.

Both Jewish and non-Jewish CUPE members picketed last Friday, Nobel said. She estimated that some 150 picketers attended throughout the afternoon's demonstration.

"Nobody from CUPE has come down from the offices to formally acknowledge us," said Nobel.

"I hope the resolution will be rescinded, but I know it won't be. Some sort of reaction from [CUPE Ontario president] Sid Ryan would be nice. He doesn't speak for all 200,000 workers in Ontario like he says he does," Nobel said.

"He hasn't heard the last from us."

The Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies, which has been highly critical of the CUPE resolution, planned a rally against it for Monday afternoon in front of the legislature at Queen's Park.

At the University of Toronto, 23-year-old teaching assistant Daniel Nadler, who is Jewish, told the National Post that he plans to sue CUPE Ontario to have the courts rule on whether unions can spend workers' money on issues that he believes are "irrelevant" to the interests of its members.

On its website, Nadler's union, local 3902, which represents short-term instructional staff at U of T, said it "respects the right of chartered organizations with which we are affiliated – such as CUPE Ontario and CUPE National – to take positions on all issues."

Referring to the Israel resolution, it said that "this is a painful and complex issue" and "we respect our members right to choose their own positions in this regard, to debate them at will and to disagree with each other."

It also noted the local has not taken a position on the resolution.

Document links suspect to Nazi camp: expert

ST. CATHARINES, Ont. — A German historian testified last week that the name Josef Furmanchuk appeared in a weapons log from the Flossenburg concentration camp in Germany and that according to the log, he was issued with a rifle and bayonet.

Furmanchuk's name also appeared in guard transfer lists, historian Johannes Tuchel testified at an immigration hearing.

The Crown alleges that Josef Furman, 87, is Josef Furmanchuk, a Nazi guard who misrepresented his wartime service when he immigrated to Canada in 1949.

Furman, who lives in Edmonton, and Jura Skomatchuk, of St. Catharines, are facing possible loss of citizenship if a court finds they hid their wartime service.

Both men have denied the allegations against them.

The Crown alleges Furman took part in the liquidation of the Warsaw Ghetto in Poland in April and May 1943, and the Bialystok Ghetto in Poland in August of 1943. He was later transferred to the German concentration camp of Flossenburg, where prisoners were made to work at hard labour in granite quarries.

Skomatchuk allegedly served as a Trawniki guard when 40,000 Jewish inmates of the labour camps at Poniatowa, Majdanek and Trawniki were executed. He later allegedly guarded Jewish internees at the Poniatowa forced labour camp.

Tuchel told court it was highly probable that Skomatchuk, 85, was a guard at the Trawniki SS training camp and eventually served in Mauthhausen. Skomatchuk's name appeared on guard transfer lists along with an identification number, as well as on another wartime document after he asked that a misplaced pay book be forwarded to him.

UTT arsonist's mother to be tried

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The mother of the young man who firebombed United Talmud Torahs will go on trial, but not before the fall.

Quebec Court Judge Martin Vauclair ruled last Friday that there was enough evidence to try Rouba El-Merhebi Fahd, 38, on the charge of being an accessory after the fact to her son Sleiman El-Merhebi's arson.

A trial date is scheduled to be set Sept. 5. El-Merhebi Fahd was arrested in May 2004 and has been free on $10,000 bail since her arraignment. She pleaded not guilty in December 2004.

Manitoba premier lauds Israel

By REBECA KUROPATWA
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Premier Gary Doer said he is "dedicated to opposing any group, organizations or countries that is set on the elimination of Israel."

Doer was speaking at Jewish National Fund (JNF) of Canada's June 13 Negev Gala 2006 held at Winnipeg's Centennial Concert Hall, at which he was the guest of honour.

"I also believe it is important to speak at every opportunity. Silence is not acceptable," he said.

"Unspeakable acts of terrorism against innocent people happen [in Israel], just because they were Jewish, living in Israel."

Doer "was struck by the vulnerability of the geography [in Israel]," he said. "When you just hear the name 'Golan Heights,' you don't know it means lobbing bombs onto people in schools just below."

JNF Israeli emissary Rami Kleinman said Doer "has been very proactive in everything to do with Manitoba and Israel. His support for Israel extends beyond the [Israel-Manitoba] partnership– he also has a deep and sincere belief in Israel's right to exist."

The Israel-Manitoba partnership aims to work with northern communities in Manitoba and Israel by setting up greenhouses and tree cloning – methods that have proven very successful in the deserts of Israel.

The internationally renowned Voices of Israel, made up of Ruthi Navon, Shlomit Aharon, Ilanit, Yardena Arazi, and Margalit Zanani, performed for the 1,600-person audience at the gala. The singers come from Yemenite, French, Polish, Brazilian and Israeli backgrounds.

Proceeds from the event go to the Israel-Manitoba research partnership.

High school student recognized for her efforts to help others

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Emily Rose says her first trip to Israel four years ago helped launch her on the road to social action.

Over the past four years, the Gray Academy high school student has organized school fundraising events for cancer research, the World Wildlife Federation and needy communities in Africa. This year, her Grade 12 year, she wrote, staged and directed a play at the school and served as a weekly teen columnist for the Jewish Post & News. A song she wrote won first prize at her school's annual Israel Song Festival.

Her last year in high school culminated with her being recognized as one of the YM-YWCA's Women of Distinction (she received the Gerrie Hammond Memorial Award of Promise), and at her graduation, her efforts on behalf of the Winnipeg Jewish federation were recognized when she was given the Gerry Koffman Tehila Award, created in memory of the longtime Combined Jewish Appeal executive director who died in 2004. The Koffman award includes a one-year scholarship to the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Emily Rose

Rose first went to Jerusalem through Partnership 2000, a program established in 2000 to build relationships between the smaller Jewish communities in Halifax, Ottawa, Winnipeg, Calgary, Edmonton and Vancouver and communities in Israel's northern Galilee region.

A major focus of Partnership 2000 is the Living Bridge Program, which connects students and teachers in the six Canadian communities with their counterparts in the northern Galilee, through phone calls, e-mails and exchange programs. Rose was one of the Gray Academy students who went on the first exchange visit to Israel in 2002.

"I was in Grade 9 at that time," she recalls. "Terrorism was at its peak, and not many students were willing to sign up. But my mother always talked about how important it was to support Israel."

That first visit to Israel opened a lot of doors for her, she says.

"It was a hands-on learning experience. That face-to-face connection with our peers in Israel can't be replicated in any other way. While we learned about Israeli society, we also had to examine our own society in order to explain Canada to the people we met."

Rose says she was a little shy before her Partnership 2000 trip to Israel, and "it helped me come out of my shell."

Her emergence as a leadership force also came from her family, however. "My family was always discussing world issues," she says.

In Grade 9, she decided to run for student council with the goal of heading the Gray Academy's environmental committee. It was a position for which there was not a lot of interest among her fellow students, she says, but "I had some ideas about what I wanted to do. I changed the name to the environmental and social action committee."

That first year, she arranged a six-hour "musicthon" to raise money for War Child International and organized the first of her four annual "30-Hour Famines," with funds raised going toward a project in Africa (Darfur this year).

In Grade 10, she started an annual event at the school to raise awareness of endangered species and collect money for the World Wildlife Fund.

She also helped organize the first "Loonie-Toonie Day" at the Asper Campus that year, to raise money for cancer research. The students raised $1,000 and donated it to Cancer-Care Manitoba in memory of popular English teacher and nationally known children's author Sheldon Oberman, who had died of cancer a few months before.

In Grade 10 as well, she began volunteering for the United Way, Winnipeg's major fundraising organization. Last year, the United Way honoured Rose with a Community Service Award.

Rose called the play she wrote and directed this winter Radio. She says it was based on her Partnership 2000 experiences in Israel and those of a follow-up visit two years ago. (She has been a drama student of the Prairie Theatre Exchange school through most of her school years.) The play ran for two evenings at the Asper Campus, and she donated the money raised – about $1,000 – to Magen David Adom.

Rose is working as a camp counsellor at the YMCA's Camp Stephens this summer. In the fall, she is leaving for Israel, where she is enrolled in a year-long leadership program usually reserved for Israeli young people.

"The program is for young Israelis about to join the army," she says. "The object is to get students more involved in politics and leadership. We will be spending three days a week studying Israeli history, politics and philosophy. There will also be hiking and camping outings."

She says she is also looking forward to studying Arabic as part of the program and maybe working with the Bedouin.

As to the future, she says she has a lot of possibilities open to her. "I want to be able to help people," she says. "And I really like journalism."

Teen jazz singer in demand with Canadian bands

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — In just three short years, Sophie Berkal-Sarbit has graduated from playing leads in elementary school productions to singing with big bands in Winnipeg and Toronto.

Sophie Berkal-Sarbit

The 14-year-old has a number of jazz gigs coming up this summer. On June 18, she was to perform at the Winnipeg Jazz Festival as the vocalist for the Manitoba High School Big Band at Old Market Square.

On June 25, she will be performing at Nathan Phillips Square in Toronto for the TD Canada Trust Toronto Jazz Festival. On July 14, she's back in Winnipeg to appear at the Canwest Global Jazz Concert with Walle Larson and Rick Boughton. On July 30, she makes a return trip to Toronto for the Beaches Jazz Festival. In August, she has been booked to sing in Winnipeg with both the Walle Larson Big Band and the Ron Paley Big Band.

Berkal-Sarbit is a granddaughter of Rabbi Louis Berkal, who for more than 50 years was the much-loved cantor at Shaarey Zedek Synagogue, Winnipeg's largest congregation.

The youngster started singing in Grade 4. Her vocal interests at first were musical theatre numbers.

"My dad [nationally known investment analyst Larry Sarbit] has a large jazz collection," she said. "One day three years ago, he had me listen to some of the music. I really got into it."

Berkal-Sarbit made an impressive debut in the world of jazz two years ago when the young singer won in the best Broadway vocalist category in the New York International Music Festival, which was held in Las Vegas. The showcase aims to help new singers and bands break into the music business.

Berkal-Sarbit competed against 200 other performers, almost all of them adults. Her mother, Harriet, said she received a standing ovation at the end of her performance.

To be eligible for the New York Festival, Berkal-Sarbit had to submit a demo CD with jazz and Broadway numbers. With accordionist Shayla Fink of the Klezmer group Finjan accompanying her, Berkal-Sarbit recorded a CD titled Drop Everything – Have a Listen.

After Las Vegas, she played the Los Angeles leg of the festival, which opened with a celebrity gala evening with performers, artists and filmmakers. She sang in front of distributors, record producers and talent agency personnel, as well as international media representatives.

Currently, she flies to Toronto once a month to study with vocal coach Elaine Overhalt. She is also looking forward to putting out her first album soon.

"I'm really excited about appearing at the upcoming jazz festivals," Berkal-Sarbit said. "I love singing with big bands."

Ottawa study looks at unaffiliated Jews

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The 2001 census found that nearly 70 per cent of Ottawa couples in which both spouses were age 30 or younger were intermarried.

This is just one of the shocking statistics that prompted a community-wide review and call to action by the Jewish Federation of Ottawa

Why are so many Jews not actively engaged in the Jewish community, and how can the community reach out to them in an effective way?

In its quest for answers, the federation engaged the Jewish Outreach Institute (JOI) of New York, which undertook an extensive "outreach scan" of the local Jewish community. JOI used a variety of methodologies, including anonymous e-mails, anonymous telephone calls, website scans and telephone interviews, as well as contacting all community synagogues and institutions, in order to give community leaders an overview of the community's "outreach capacity" and trends.

On June 5, Rabbi Kerry Olitzky, JOI's executive director, presented the scan's findings and recommendations at a meeting at the Soloway Jewish Community Centre. Representatives of various community groups heard the results and discussed the recommendations before a capacity crowd.

Rona Shaffran-Tannenbaum, chair of the federation's Jewish identity committee, said the priority is "to reach and engage more people – people who are unaffiliated, disengaged. If the community does not touch the lives of the majority of those who live here, we all lose."

Rabbi Olitzky spoke of the importance of taking every opportunity to make newcomers – the Jewish "unengaged" – feel welcome and wanted. Often, people answering the phone at Jewish institutions are either not well informed, not particularly helpful, or otherwise ineffective in engaging callers.

"The phone line is not a business line but a portal of entry, and all of our staff are gatekeepers to the Jewish community. Our front line is our bottom line," Rabbi Olitzky said.

JOI's "public space Judaism" model advocates holding programs in secular venues, in the public sphere, where people can "stumble upon" them and participate.

One example Rabbi Olitzky suggested was holding a Passover program in the matzah aisle of a local supermarket. Even the most unaffiliated Jews will buy a box of matzah at Passover, he said, so it's an ideal location to find and engage them.

Program costs, membership dues and other financial stumbling blocks were cited as challenges to engaging the unaffiliated. How and where to advertise programs, as well as how to engage members of intermarried families, immigrants and other minority groups within the wider Jewish community were also discussed and noted as areas of concern for further consultation.

"In the coming weeks, the committee will digest what we heard from the JOI and will come back to the community with suggestions for how to implement the recommendations," said Shaffran-Tannenbaum.

United Israel Appeal Federations Canada, the umbrella group for Canada's Jewish federations, is providing support for Ottawa's initiative as a potential national pilot project and will monitor the results, she said.

Chabad dedicates new Torah

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — If any of the neighbours in the fast-growing area of Barrhaven in suburban Ottawa were looking out their windows on Sunday afternoon, May 28, they may have thought a movie was being made at a construction site on Cedarview Road.

What other possible explanation could there have been for the parade of singing and dancing people following a truck with speakers blasting unfamiliar music, or for the strange-looking canopy hoisted by men carrying four poles, or the children following in a miniature train with clowns along for the ride?

But this was no movie set. Under a tent erected across the street from the Ottawa Torah Center Chabad's storefront premises, on property destined to hold a new synagogue, a scribe was perched on a riser, where those assembled could watch him fill in the last few letters of a new Torah scroll.

The Torah was donated by the parents of Rabbi Menachem Blum who, with his wife Dena, arrived in Barrhaven 10 years ago to spread the Chabad message. They began by holding services in the basement of their home and as attendance increased, they established a shul in a strip mall across from undeveloped land.

Construction has now begun there for a new housing development and land has been purchased for a synagogue building. Several houses surrounding the property have already been purchased by Jewish families anxious to live near the new Chabad shul.

The new Torah was dedicated in memory of Rabbi Blum's late uncle, Yosef Yitzchak Lewin, who had lived in Belgium and Israel before his untimely death two years ago at age 54.

"My family came from all over the world from France, Israel, New York – to celebrate a special occasion as we remember a dear uncle who was very dear to us and it is a very special occasion for my family," said Rabbi Blum in welcoming the large crowd who joined the celebration. "But I address you as my family because when a new Torah comes to a community, it is a simchah for us all and we celebrate as a family."

In addition to members of the Jewish community and representatives of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa, the Israeli Embassy and other congregations, several local politicians also attended.

Lisa McLeod, newly elected MPP for Nepean-Carleton, spoke first. "I just opened up my constituency office. I couldn't be more proud to be here with Rabbi Blum today because he helped me open my constituency office and he allowed me to help you to celebrate the opening of your new spiritual home," she said.

McLeod promised to fight for "fairness in education."

"I am going to be pushing this idea forward in the legislature and I know that when this government changes and we have a Conservative government, this will come into being. I want to work with this community" she said.

Nepean-Carleton MP Pierre Poilievre spoke of his travels to, and support for, Israel. "There was no more proud moment for me, as a member of Parliament, than when Prime Minister [Stephen] Harper said in the House of Commons that we would no longer send a single cent to the Hamas government [in the Palestinian Authority]," he said.

The procession continued across the street to the existing synagogue, where the Ark was opened and the two older Torah scrolls were taken out to "greet" the new arrival.

Vote on jailhouse plan won't solve anything

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

How ironic. At the same time that CUPE Ontario insists (wrongly) that Israel is in violation of international law by failing to withdraw "immediately" from the West Bank (see "CUPE's Sid Ryan obsessed with Israel," CJN, June 15), the international community is pressuring Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert to halt his plan to unilaterally withdraw from most of the West Bank. Instead, Olmert is being asked to again try to negotiate with the Palestinians.

The Economist ("Quarrels as usual," June 10) gave some background on the situation. At issue is acceptance by the Palestinian public of the "prisoners' document," a proposal put together by mainly Fatah and Hamas prisoners in Israeli jails that according to some analysts implicitly recognizes the fact, but not the right, of Israel's existence. Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas wants to hold a referendum on the document, emboldened by findings that approximately three-quarters of Palestinians favour a two-state solution.

The prisoners' document calls for an Israeli withdrawal from "all territories occupied in 1967," endorses the "right of return" of Palestinians to present-day Israel, and calls for "resistance" to an Israeli presence "in the West Bank and Jerusalem." All are impossible conditions for Israel to accept (as they imply continued terrorism and the elimination of Israel as the Jewish state – hence no real recognition of Israel, even implicitly). Still, some Israeli analysts see the document as an opportunity for Abbas to push Hamas into further international isolation by merely raising the possibility of some form of talks with Israel.

True to form, Hamas staunchly rejects the call for a referendum. Ideologically, Hamas cannot even implicitly recognize Israel, since it's committed to Israel's destruction. Moreover, Hamas is engaged in a power struggle with Abbas and Fatah, resulting in several armed conflicts, including scores of deaths and injuries over the past few weeks.

Israel is caught in the middle. According to the Economist, if a referendum on the prisoners' document is held, "pressure will grow on Israel from abroad at least to postpone [its] withdrawal plan."

Indeed, this pressure has already begun. On recent visits abroad, Olmert promised U.S. President George W. Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair that he will first try to negotiate with Abbas.

Abbas wants to move immediately to final status talks, including an Israeli withdrawal to the 1967 Green Line. But according to Ha'aretz's Akiva Eldar (June 7), Olmert is now considering a negotiated withdrawal from about 90 per cent of the West Bank and the creation of a "provisional" Palestinian state as envisioned in phase II of the internationally backed "Road Map" peace plan.

The major stumbling block, however, is that Abbas can't deliver on any proposed agreement while Hamas controls the Palestinian government. For this reason, Abbas seems determined to push ahead with the referendum on the prisoners' document.

Yet, according to former U.S. State Department Middle East negotiator Aaron David Miller, the referendum may be a step backward. In "Abbas' comeback plan is a dead end" (Los Angeles Times, June 14), Miller writes: "The problem… is that the prisoners' document that Abbas sees as the vehicle of his deliverance will only muddy the clarity of his own stand against terrorism and for negotiations – the very positions that make him credible with Israel and the U.S. The prisoners' document endorses armed resistance in the West Bank and Gaza, urges Palestinians to free prisoners by any means and gives preeminence to the Palestinian right of return."

Speaking of CUPE Ontario, in Jay Teitel's June 19 Maclean's interview with CUPE Ontario president Sid Ryan, Ryan told him that he was in Israel when former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak put an "amazing offer on the table." Ryan added that he does not understand how the late Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat could have rejected the offer.

How can Ryan square this admission – that Israel, in effect, offered the Palestinians statehood – with CUPE Ontario's insistence that Israel must be punished through a boycott for refusing "to recognize the Palestinian right to self-determination"?

Olmert convenes panel of former Israeli PMs

Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Olmert was expected to convene the first meeting of the "ex-prime ministers" club Monday to discuss the Iranian nuclear issue and how best to deal with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

Olmert and opposition head Benjamin Netanyahu last month agreed to the establishment of the informal forum to discuss sensitive security issues such as Iran.

Three of the five living former prime ministers – Netanyahu, Ehud Barak and Shimon Peres – were expected to take part along with Olmert, while 90-year-old Yitzhak Shamir will not and Ariel Sharon remains in a comatose state.

Netanyahu said last month that since each of the prime ministers had dealt with the Iranian issue from different angles, integrating their knowledge and experience could help Olmert deal with the threat.

One source in the Prime Minister's Office said that there was no particular reason for the meeting to be held Monday and that it was not tied to any immediate new developments on the Iranian nuclear issue.

The source said that beyond Olmert's desire to tap into the experience of the former prime ministers, there was also a political component to the issue: these meetings would be a way for Olmert to build a national consensus on how to deal with Iran and to neutralize any possible future criticism of the government's Iran policy by Netanyahu, who is currently leader of the opposition Likud party.

Peres, meanwhile, met over the weekend with Russian President Vladimir Putin, as well as with leaders from both Azerbaijan and Tajikistan, at a security conference in Kazakhstan.

One of the aspects of the talks was Iran, and Peres, according to sources in his office, was expected to brief Olmert, Barak and Netanyahu on the Azerbaijani and Tajik take on Ahmadinejad.

Peres has taken a relatively hard line on Iran. He said in Kazakhstan that nuclear weapons in the hands of Iran would lead to the nuclearization of the region and nuclear spillage to terrorist organizations. As a result, he warned, every international conflict will have the potential of turning nuclear.

Peres was expected to repeat at this meeting his position that Israel does not need to lead the battle to prevent Iran from obtaining nuclear weapons, but should clearly makes its voice heard regarding Iran's genocidal threat to wipe Israel off the map. He is also expected to say that Israel needs to ensure that Iran does not succeed in framing this issue as an Israeli-Iranian one.

Netanyahu was expected to report to the prime minister on his meetings over the weekend at the American Enterprise Institute conference in Boulder, Colo. Netanyahu spoke at great length on the Iranian issue with U.S. Vice-President Dick Cheney.

Representatives from Arab countries at the conference compared Iran's efforts to obtain nuclear weapons with that of communist countries and suggested that obtaining such weapons does not guarantee that they would be used. Netanyahu disagreed, saying that radical Islam should not be permitted to acquire nuclear know-how because the Iranians would use the weapons.

Barak's spokesperson said he would not reveal in advance what he would say in the closed forum. But in a recent interview, he said that although a nuclear Iran with its current government threatens the world, there may eventually be a political upheaval in Iran.

"I strongly believe that in five years from now, the ayatollahs will not rule over Iran – probably earlier – and I still remember that Iran had never participated in a direct war against Israel and that the Iranian people and regime were our best friends in the Middle East just a generation ago," Barak said. "I suggest we consider very carefully, with far-sighted perspective, any concrete opposition to be taken or shaped vis-a-vis Iran."

Red Cross deal teeters

Israel's acceptance into the International Red Cross movement may be in jeopardy. The Swiss foreign minister and an official with the International Committee of the Red Cross both cited problems in brokering the deal, which was set to be voted on this week. If passed, the decision would end nearly six decades of Israeli exclusion from the movement. Olivier Durr of the International Committee of the Red Cross said the deal, which is also slated to admit the Palestinian emergency services operation, has been "complicated by a deteriorating situation in the Middle East," Reuters reported. Swiss Foreign Minister Micheline Calmy-Rey reported problems in Israel with registering Palestinian ambulances, and allowing them to pass checkpoints.

Annan questions IDF story

Kofi Annan questioned reports that a Palestinian mine was behind the killing of at least seven picnickers on a Gaza beach earlier this month. "To find a mine on the beach is rather odd," the UN secretary-general said. An Israeli military investigation into the incident suggested a Palestinian mine was responsible and rejected claims an Israeli shell fired in exchanges with terrorists that day caused the deaths. An on-site investigation by Human Rights Watch concluded that an Israeli shell fired that day caused the deaths. Palestinian officials have called for a UN investigation. Israeli officials said they would co-operate with such a probe.

French more pro-Israel: poll

Israeli press reported that French attitudes toward Israel have improved greatly during the past four years, according to a new poll. Some 38 per cent of French citizens said they sympathize with Israel and an equal number chose the Palestinians, according to the poll, conducted by the Pew survey organization. Four years ago, 36 per cent sympathized with the Palestinians and 19 per cent with Israel.

Rabin's killer to be a father?

Israel's Supreme Court ruled that Yitzhak Rabin's assassin and his wife could try to have a child through artificial insemination. The court rejected an appeal seeking to block efforts by Yigal Amir and Larissa Trimbobler to conceive, saying the right to become a parent is a basic human right. Other convicted murderers had been allowed to become parents, the court noted. The Israel Prison Service said it would allow the couple to try to have a child through artificial insemination.

Train accident kills 5

Five people were killed and at least 40 injured when a commuter train hit a truck in central Israel last week. Most of the injuries were not life-threatening, Army Radio reported. Several people were trapped in the wreckage. The train derailed near the coastal city of Netanya when it hit a truck that had apparently stalled crossing the tracks. The train's locomotive and several cars were overturned in the collision.

Israel is reportedly drafting a plan for a West Bank withdrawal that officials hope might be carried out in co-ordination with Mahmoud Abbas. Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has been promoting a unilateral withdrawal, but it has been criticized abroad and by Palestinians. The new plan would propose a deal with Abbas, the Palestinian Authority president, to establish a Palestinian state with provisional borders in Gaza and some 90 per cent of the West Bank. The provisional West Bank border would follow the route of the security fence, except in the Jordan Valley. In the past, Abbas has rejected the idea of a state with provisional borders, but Ha'aretz reported that Israeli officials expect the United States will encourage him to accept the proposal.

Praying at the wall

Israel's Supreme Court ordered the state and Israel's Conservative movement to find a compromise over egalitarian prayers at the Western Wall. The compromise should be made in the next month, the court said. The area in question, called Robinson's Arch, is at the southern end of the Western Wall, where non-Orthodox groups have been praying in recent years. The government has begun charging worshippers about $6 (US) each to pray there after 8 a.m., claiming their presence interferes with tourists visiting the site. The Masorti movement, the Conservative stream's name in Israel, petitioned the court, claiming discrimination

Revitalizing the Zionist movement

Breakstone is also the official representative of Conservative Judaism's Zionist arm on the WZO executive.

In the past, organizations aligned with the traditional Zionist political parties such as Labor and Likud were the main forces at the Congress. In recent years, Diaspora Jews have aligned themselves instead with the various religious streams.

The main theme of this year's conference was revitalizing the Zionist movement.

If in the past the focus was "strengthening and fortifying a Jewish state, than the emphasis now is on creating of Israel an exemplary society. The feeling is not that we are creating a new definition of Zionism, but going back to the original," Breakstone said.

A master showman, Herzl conceived the initial Zionist congress as a grand, almost regal affair. He even sent his friend Max Nordau back to his hotel to put on a tie when Nordau arrived without one.

Delegates at the initial congress voted for the Basel Program, which called for the establishment of a "home for the Jewish people in Palestine, secured by public law." They also established the institutions that made up the organization, including the Zionist Executive and the Zionist General Council, which meet between the quadrennial congresses.

The initial congress established institutions to carry out its policies that still exist today, including Keren Hayesod and the Jewish National Fund, which focuses on land issues.

When Britain took control of Palestine in 1917, an organization was needed to represent the Jewish people. The Zionist Organization, as Herzl had dubbed it, first assumed that responsibility, but in 1929 a larger body, the Jewish Agency, was established to handle the task.

The Jewish Agency was built as a partnership between the Zionist Organization and other Jewish groups. In the years before the founding of the state, the agency was a quasi-government that helped build the country's infrastructure, create settlements and facilitate immigration.

When the State of Israel was founded, Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion considered doing away with the apparatus of the Zionist movement.

"At first, Ben-Gurion said the Zionist movement was scaffolding that could now be taken apart. Whoever was a Zionist should just move to Israel, he said," recounted Amos Yovel, chief editor of the WZO's publishing house, which publishes books on Zionism.

But Ben-Gurion soon realized he would need Diaspora Jewry's support to make Israel a viable state. Furthermore, with the state consumed with issues of security and economy, it was thought that organizations like the WZO and Jewish Agency could focus on immigration, settlement and Jewish education in the Diaspora.

The role of the WZO shifted with the country's development. In the 1950s and 1960s, the focus was on agricultural settlement. In the late 1970s, it was on development towns.

By this time, a division of responsibility had been made between the WZO and the Jewish Agency, with the WZO focusing more on Diaspora issues and the Jewish Agency on immigrant absorption and educational programming for Israeli youth.

By the mid-1990s, Davis said, a growing rift was noted between Diaspora and Israeli Jews. Partnership programs were launched to bring a new generation of Jews to Israel, where they could see programs on the ground that they help support.

Argentine team has Jewish coach and team captain

By JOE GOLDMAN
JTA

BUENOS AIRES — A Jewish player is trying to help kick Argentina's national team to soccer's World Cup, with help from the team's Jewish coach.

Both the coach, Jose Pekerman, 56, and the player, Juan Pablo Sorin, 30, have their roots in the Buenos Aires-based club Argentinos Juniors, best known as the team where superstar Diego Maradona first honed his talent.

"In the past, Argentina has had a sprinkling of Jewish players in its local league," Adrian Stoppleman, an Argentine Jewish sportswriter, said. "But to have two such key people like the coach and team captain being Jewish is truly an achievement to be proud of."

Pekerman, 56, was born in Villa Dominguez – otherwise known as Moisesville, the area where the "Jewish gauchos," or cowboys, lived – in Entre Rios province, but he has lived much of his life in the Jewish neighbourhood of Villa Crespo in Buenos Aires.

He was a solid midfielder who played from 1970 to 1974 for Argentinos Juniors, in the first division of Argentine soccer. He then had a short stint playing for Colombia's Independiente Medellin, before becoming a coach.

At first, he worked as a youth division coach, in jobs that barely paid the rent. In fact, for a number of years, Pekerman drove a taxi at night. So it was a real surprise when he was named coach of the national youth teams in 1994. Under his guidance, the Argentine under-23 teams won three world championships. In 2004, he was promoted to coach the national team.

Sorin, 30, is a defender-midfielder whose dynamic blend of spirit and intelligence made him an obvious choice for team captain. The other players say he is a natural leader off the field. During the game, he is, in many ways, the player who sets the rhythm and tone for the Argentines.

Sorin has also played for teams around the world, and this year, led his small Spanish league team, Villareal, into the European UEFA Cup semifinals.

In Argentina, Sorin had his own radio show, and last year, he edited a children's book whose proceeds went to a foundation for children with health and nutritional problems.

Argentina has already qualified for the second round of the World Cup, which will crown its winner on July 9.

Ghana striker shows there is more to life in Israel

By JEREMY LAST
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — This year's World Cup has provided its fair share of surprises – the ease with which Ecuador has managed to qualify for the second round, Australia's amazing comeback against Japan, and of course, Ghana's 2-0 victory over the Czech Republic.

When Ghana striker Asamoah Gyan fired the African side into the lead after just 70 seconds on Saturday, it was enough of a surprise.

But one thing few people expected was to see an Israeli flag waved straight at the television camera by one of the Ghana players celebrating the goal.

Hapoel Tel Aviv's John Pantsil didn't stop there. At the end of the game, he proudly paraded around the pitch holding the blue and white flag in the air.

Pantsil is one of three Israel-based players on the Ghana squad, but the only one to have played a significant part in the Black Stars' success. (Ashdod keeper Sammy Adjei has yet to make an appearance and Hapoel Kfar Saba's Emmanuel Pappoe only played in the first half of the loss to Italy.)

Pantsil's celebration was clearly planned in advance – he appeared to have kept the flag hidden in his sock and was hoping for an opportunity to show the world how much he cares about and loves the country he lives and works in.

Explaining his actions later, the defender told one Israeli sports website: "I love the fans in Israel. I have played at Hapoel and Maccabi Tel Aviv and the fans always made me happy. So I wanted to make them happy."

That was it. Pure and simple.

Too often Israeli soccer is directly connected with politics. When the national team or an Israeli club plays abroad, there can be protests against the situation in the territories, as occurred in the game against Ireland last year.

But at last we have an ambassador for Israel who doesn't care about politics.

The flag-waving spoke volumes about Israeli football and this country.

Israel is seen by many people as a dangerous and controversial country, the last place you would decide to move to for work.

But sports is different.

The Israeli Premier League is packed with foreign players, many of whom have lived in the country for years.

Some don't settle in. For example, Betar Jerusalem's Spanish striker David Aganzo left after only a few months.

But more often than not, they fall in love with the country, and especially with the passionate Israeli fans.

And, like Pantsil, when many foreign players leave the club they originally came to play for, they move to another within Israel and stay here for a significant amount of time.

Croatian Giovani Rosso has been in Israel for the last 10 years. He first came to play for Hapoel Be'er Sheva in 1996 and has since played for four other teams, including Hapoel Haifa, Betar Jerusalem, Maccabi Haifa and Maccabi Tel Aviv.

It's the same in basketball.

Maccabi Tel Aviv captain Derrick Sharp has been in Israel so long he even manages to slip in a few words of Hebrew during interviews with Israeli TV.

And former Maccabi star Sarunas Jasikevicius may have moved on to the NBA's Indiana Pacers, but he is one of the many foreign sports players to have found love with an Israeli girl (in this case, former Miss World, Linor Abergil), and he was back in Israel a few weeks ago to cheer on his former club in its championship game.

There's no doubt that Israel is a state fraught with controversy and problems. But last weekend, one Ghanaian showed the world there is more to life here.

Boycott decisions a disgrace

By CHARLES SMALL and EMANUELE OTTOLENGHI

Comment

Britain's largest union of university teachers, the National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education (NATFHE), on May 29, decided to instruct its members to boycott Israeli academics who do not denounce the Israeli "government's policies in the territories." The decision was made only four days before NATFHE merged with the Association of University Teachers (AUT), the other British academics' union, into a new union that proceeded immediately to disavow the boycott and declare it "expired" on the day the two merged.

The same week, the Ontario branch of Canada's largest union, the Canadian Union of Public Employees, followed a similar path, advocating a boycott of Israel until it reverses some of its policies, including its refusal to concede a right of return to Palestinian refugees.

Despite the limited reach of the Canadian decision and the short shelf life of the British one, both decisions were a disgrace.

The NATFHE resolution violated basic principles of academic freedom – a sharing of universal knowledge, irrespective of nationality, political creed or affiliation. It also breached the definition of anti-Semitism adopted by the European Union Monitoring Centre on Racism and Xenophobia .

The CUPE resolution amounts to a demand that Israel commit national suicide.

But the academic boycott, if enacted, would have been more insidious than CUPE's support for the right of return. CUPE is unlikely to affect foreign policy, but NATFHE's resolution could have had more enduring effects, because it undermines the free spirit of inquiry so central to academia. One can only hope that academic boycotters will now rest their case, but their persistence – the first effort was launched by British Jewish scholar, Steven Rose, in 2002 – suggests otherwise, especially given that the reversal of the NATFHE decision is based on a technicality, not on a substantive rejection of the principle of boycott.

NATFHE's totalitarian edict is tantamount to an oath of allegiance that scholars, just on account of their nationality and regardless of their expertise, research area and personal political inclinations, must undertake if they want to be welcome again in the academic family. It does not take much of an imagination to reminisce of a time when only a few select Jews were permitted entrance to societal institutions after they distanced themselves from their communal beliefs and values. The boycotters bring from Europe's past an echo of that legacy of brutality.

Especially for non-tenured and junior scholars, this policy, if adopted, could have potentially devastating consequences. Non-compliance would lead to papers not published, grants withdrawn, post-doctoral positions denied and ultimately careers ruined.

Incredibly, the boycotters are seemingly political hacks who demonstrate little understanding of the political and ideological reality on the ground in the region. Their approach was adopted at a time when Israel's new centre-left government reaffirmed with new vigour its predecessors' commitment to implementing the Road Map peace plan, evacuating settlements and promoting negotiations with the Palestinians. Successive Israeli governments have endorsed the ideal of a two-state solution and worked toward it. Sadly, this finds no equivalent on the Palestinian side. Currently, Palestine is under a Hamas-led government, an organization that perfected suicide terrorism as a tool of engagement, and continues to vigorously make the destruction of Israel one of its policy objectives. Yet, driven by an irrational hatred for Israel and blinded by ideology, the boycotters appear impervious to facts.

But even if Israel's record was worse and the Palestinians intentions were better, a boycott would still be wrong for three reasons:

- The standard adopted against Israel – a democracy – is much harsher than that used against any country in the Arab world, which are hardly beacons of democracy, minority rights and religious freedom;
- Isolating Israeli academics is bound to deprive the academic community of invaluable research from a group of scholars who have greatly enhanced knowledge in all fields over the years; and
- Promoting a one-sided political agenda against those who refuse to conform to ideological orthodoxy is contrary to the values of freedom for which academia, and indeed western democracies, stand, regardless of the policies pursued by the country where those academics happen to teach.

Ideas should have no passport, and scholarly endeavours should be considered as extra-territorial. To make the advancement of scholarship conditional on oaths of allegiance to political correctness is not bound to advance the cause of freedom. If anything, it does the opposite, as it transpires from the boycotters' true intentions. They claim to promote an agenda of freedom from discrimination. In fact, they provide succor to a Hamas government that not only calls for the destruction of Israel but also promotes, as evident in its charter, genocidal, anti-Semitic hatred rooted in the Protocols of Zion forgery.

When boycotters condemn Israel for the so-called apartheid wall, powerful and distorting images resonate. But the wall – or fence – has saved lives from the scourge of Palestinian terrorism, something that NATFHE has not even bothered to condemn because it does not, evidently, consider the murder of Jews as a crime worthy of being prevented by Israel and condemned by the world.

To compound hypocrisy with naiveté, NATFHE accused Israel of stymieing Palestinian academic freedom through its security measures – as if trying to save citizens' lives from terrorism was meant to silence academics. The truth is that even if Israel withdrew from the territories and the defence barrier were to disappear – indeed, even if Israel were to disappear – Israel's fate would pale in comparison to what is in store for Palestinians who do not agree with their authoritarian regime.

Even before Hamas came to power, there was little freedom and little safety for minorities and dissenting voices. What will happen now to religious minorities, women and gay people in the Palestinian society? When democratic values are replaced with theocratic governance, what will happen to Palestinian universities, civic society and intellectual life that NATFHE claimed its anti-Israel resolution would defend? Anyone observing Palestinian society today, with its brewing civil war and its rapid descent into anarchy, knows that boycotts will not save Palestinians from themselves. But don't despair. When that happens, there will surely be academic voices in Britain ready to blame Israel.

Dance teacher celebrates 36 years of Rikudiyah

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Teme Kernerman found her lifelong passion for dance as a young teenager at Camp Kvutza.

A dance teacher at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre for almost 40 years, Kernerman says she started out at camp as an arts and crafts instructor, "but when I became more and more involved in the dance program, they asked me to take over.

"That was the beginning of my journey. I never looked back," says Kernerman, who also met her husband Barry at camp that summer.

Teme Kernerman

Kernerman conceived of and initiated Rikudiyah, Toronto's annual Israel dance festival for children, which this year celebrated its 36th – double chai – anniversary.

She began Rikudiyah because she wanted to share something that means so much to her, she says. "When we started 36 years ago, 40 children danced in a BJCC classroom."

This year, the festival, which has been held in the Tait McKenzie Building at York University since 1979, involved more than 400 dancers ranging in age from eight to 80.

"It's strictly non-competitive, and instructors dance with their groups so there is no pressure. I want kids to come out and have a good time."

Her aim is to acquaint children with Israeli dance and have them recognize it as part of their heritage.

"It has become a cultural landmark in the community," she says.

In a "Generation to Generation" dance this year, Grade 2 students danced with their parents. "One of those pairs was my daughter Varda [she also has a son, Doron] and granddaughter Arielle."

Kernerman, who studied in New York under such dancers as Jose Limon, Hanya Holm and Doris Humphrey, became the Bloor Jewish Community Centre's first full-time dance director in 1957.

She worked there for several years before moving to Israel, and then in 1968, she came to what is now the BJCC, where she began developing its folk dance program.

Among Kernerman's many accomplishments is founding the Chai Dancers, a 27-year-old dance troupe for people 55 years and over. Also to her credit is founding the Nirkoda Israeli Dancers, a troupe that started up in 1955 at the Bloor JCC, which danced together for about 25 years before disbanding.

"In 2000, though, I asked the dancers to perform at Rikudiyah as alumni." They've been together ever since – with Kernerman as a consultant – under Ronit Eizenman, a former Nirkoda dancer. Next month, the group is performing at the Karmiel Dance Festival in Israel.

Along with co-ordinating Israeli and international folk- dance activities for youth, adults and seniors at the BJCC, she was supervisor of senior adult services for 15 years.

"I believe dance is therapeutic," says Kernerman, who founded the Ontario Folk Dance Association about 48 years ago, co-founded the annual weekend-long Ontario Folk Dance Camp, and founded the Folk Dance Teachers' Association.

"The music, the movement, the socialization – it is the best non-medicinal high that anyone can get. It is the universal language of the feet, and it's intergenerational," says Kernerman.

If students come to class feeling down or depressed, she says, they leave feeling exhilarated. "With the music playing and the people dancing, how can you feel down?"

If a person wants to learn to dance, they can, she says. "It takes time and continuity, though. You cannot learn to dance in one session. Like any skill, you just have to keep going. I can get rid of a person's two left feet, and leave them with one right and one left."

Dancing is also a confidence builder, she says. "The more you dance, the more you want to get out and do it, and the better you become."

Folk dancing is the dance of the people, she says, and in Israel it is still "wildly popular. There are thousands of Israeli folk dances, and they're still being created. People go out and dance every night."

Kernerman feels lucky that her career has been a labour of love.

"It has given me the opportunity to pioneer all kinds of dance activities, to choreograph, and to attend dance workshops. What could be better? I intend to go on as long as I can."

Lilah's Fund event targets childhood cancer

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Lilah Petersiel is a little girl of two years, whose parents, Tami Moscoe and Eric Petersiel, describe her on a website as "charismatic and bubbly."

That's a description they weren't sure they would be able to use, when Lilah was diagnosed at birth with neuroblastoma, a childhood cancer that affects the sympathetic nervous system.

Since they can, however, and to help other children with this disease, they are planning the second annual "Sunday in the Park with Lilah," a picnic and all-day fun event, on June 25.

The event will be held at the Toronto French School, 296 Lawrence Ave. E., at Bayview and Lawrence. Registration is at 9 a.m.

Opening ceremonies and a short fundraising walk will start at 9:45, followed by family fun-fair activities, musical entertainment at 11:30, a barbecue lunch, a promotional draw and a silent auction.

Lilah was born April 14, 2004. An abdominal scan immediately after birth found a golf-ball-sized tumour on one of her adrenal glands. After surgery, she seemed to be fine, until a later routine CAT scan showed tumour clumps on her liver.

More surgery and four bouts of chemotherapy followed, treatment that included frequent visits to SickKids.

During her treatment, her family created Lilah's Fund, which works with the James Fund for Neuroblastoma Research. That fund is named after James Birrell, an eight-year-old Peterborough boy who died in 2001 after fighting the disease for five years.

Lilah, now two, and thriving in day care, will be there to join in the fun.

Canadian artist paints a mural in central Jerusalem

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Renowned Canadian artist Ian Leventhal recently completed a large mural titled Jerusalem Welcomes – a cityscape that is the first renewal project to revitalize central Jerusalem.

The Ben Yehuda pedestrian walk, between Zion and Zahal squares, is to be renewed by the Jerusalem Foundation and the city's municipal government. Young English-speaking visitors and students congregate there.

Leventhal, accompanied by his wife Renee and his daughters Natalie and Jordana, worked on the mural with six young clients of the Crossroads Drop-in Centre, which is located just off Ben Yehuda. The centre offers counselling services to youths at risk and helps teens to turn themselves around.

The colourful 20-by-10-foot mural depicts Jerusalem as a place of welcome, showing animated figures dancing in the Old City. The mural project was underwritten by a Toronto family that was inspired by the idea of reviving central Jerusalem and undertaken by the Canadian Friends of the Jerusalem Foundation.

"I packed my brushes and embarked on this creative experience," said Leventhal.

The mural, which Leventhal painted on site, is dedicated to Charles Coffey, vice-president of the Royal Bank and an honorary member of the Jerusalem Foundation of Canada.

During the dedication of the mural, David Azrieli, president of the Jerusalem Foundation of Canada, noted that Coffey is a strong supporter of the Jewish community.

The inscription on the plaque accompanying the Jerusalem Welcomes mural, written by Coffey, reads, "My Irish-Catholic father's friendship with Sam Meltz in Woodstock, New Brunswick, in 1925, that in itself is significant. That I became supportive and understanding of Jewish causes is the gift those two men gave me."

The plan for the revival of Jerusalem's city centre also calls for a light-rail system running from Pisgat Ze'ev past the Old City and down Jaffa Road to Mount Herzl.

"All eyes are on the revival and all the economic vitality and prosperity which will emanate from this project is of prime importance to Jerusalem," Leventhal said.

"I am delighted to have created the mural as a spin-off project of the revitalization."

Leventhal, who has been involved with the Jerusalem Foundation of Canada since 1990 and was recently appointed part-time executive director of the Toronto advisory committee, noted that the Jerusalem Foundation was dormant in Canada for a decade.

He said the foundation has been revitalized with the establishment of a new Canadian desk in Israel, headed by Steve Solomon, formerly of Montreal. Solomon now lives in Jerusalem. Monica Berger of Montreal is the Canadian executive director.

With offices in Montreal, Toronto and Ottawa, the foundation plans to expand to other locations in Canada.

Klezmer player breaks down musical barriers

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

David Buchbinder

David Buchbinder is probably the busiest musician in Toronto. At any one time he's got at least four projects on the go, and planning for a few more. However, when I visited him at home recently, he was surprisingly relaxed.

Wearing a ratty orange tank top and white shorts, he was sitting in his basement office next to his new assistant. He escorted me to his backyard to show off his new hobby. "I've been doing some gardening," he said, pointing at the colourful flowers blooming by his garage.

Before I visited Buchbinder, I expected the trumpet player to be practising for his two shows at the Toronto Jazz Festival. Instead, he was showing his assistant the ropes and finalizing another gig.

So how does someone so busy find time to train a new assistant and tend to his garden? "Infrastructure," he says referring to his new hire. "I've steadily learned to put infrastructure into place, where I don't do everything myself. If I have to do everything, the pressure becomes too intense."

Now that Buchbinder's got someone to take care of the business end of his work, he can focus squarely on his always-evolving oeuvre. Besides playing with the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band, Buchbinder's main project right now – or at least during the jazz festival – is his Shurum Burum Big Band.

Buchbinder put the group together two years ago as part of the Shurum Burum Circus, a theatrical performance that fused live music with acrobatics and dancing. The show ran for a limited time, but the music endured Buchbinder released a full-length record of the Big Band's music last November. The jazz festival is the group's second gig.

"[The music] is pretty diverse – it's a pretty unique sound," says Buchbinder. "It's very theatrical. In live performance I really like to push all of us to be open to the moment. There has to be space for chaos and improv."

It shouldn't be hard for Buchbinder to find those chaotic moments – there are plenty of them on the record. From the rapid-fire horns on Invectus to the part klezmer, part salsa vibe of Samarkand, the band pushes jazz's boundaries to its limits.

Buchbinder has been breaking down musical barriers for about 20 years now, since he formed the Juno-nominated Flying Bulger Klezmer band in 1987. Since then, he's played with countless musicians, formed numerous bands, written a few film scores, all the while playing bar and bat mitzvahs.

"I love to learn," he says, explaining why he takes on so much at once. "I feel there's a lot I have to say musically. There's a lot of music I want to experience. For a long time I was doing one thing, the Bulgars, and staying in that new Jewish, Yiddish vein, but in a way that was my training ground. There were a lot of things I needed to learn to fulfil whatever this larger vision I seem to have is."

This vision still includes playing Jewish simchahs, something he's done since day one.

"I love doing them," says the former carpenter. "I'm always creating projects where I'm front and centre, so it's easy for me to embrace and enjoy being in service to someone else. Also, they pay well and that's really important because it allows me to do other stuff, and weddings, especially Jewish weddings, give me the chance and the band the chance to play klezmer for what it was invented for."

For now though, Buchbinder is concentrating on the Toronto Jazz Festival where, in addition to playing with the Shurum Burum Big Band, he'll perform with the David Buchbinder Klezmer Trio, a group that regularly plays Sunday brunches at the Free Times Café.

With several other projects in the works, including a recording session with Cuban jazz pianist Hilario Duran, it's hard to imagine Buchbinder ever slowing down.

"Why do I do so much?" he says. "There's just so much to do."

David Buchbinder's Klezmer Trio performs on June 25, 6 p.m., at GreekTown Sounds of the Danforth Tuborg Stage at Danforth and Logan avenues. His Shurum Burum Big Band plays on June 29, 12 p.m. to 2 p.m., on the mainstage at Nathan Phillips Square.

Documentary portrays Gehry as complex and prickly

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Architect Frank Gehry's Walt Disney Concert Hall in Los Angeles. [Sheldon Kirshner photo]

Love him or hate him, Toronto-born Frank Gehry is an architect whose innovative designs scream out for attention.

His stark, sculptured, futuristic buildings of titanium, glass, concrete and steel, ranging from the Guggenheim Museum in Bilbao, Spain, to the Walt Disney Concert Hall in Los Angeles, trigger awe or scorn.

No one can feign indifference to Gehry, whose commissions have taken him to countries such as Canada, Germany, Israel, France, Switzerland and Japan. With Gehry, there is no middle ground.

Gehry, whose renowned colleague Philip Johnson describes him as the greatest living architect of our times, is the subject of Sydney Pollack's documentary, Sketches of Frank Gehry, which opened here on June 16.

The title of this 82-minute film, shot in a variety of locales, is inspired by Gehry's habit of starting a design with a simple, stylized sketch.

With the help of assistants at his studio in Santa Monica, Calif., he turns these abstract drawings into three-dimensional models, which are often made of cardboard bound together by strips of tape.

In an early scene in this generally interesting biopic, Gehry hovers over a model of an an ultra-modern work in progress, tinkering with it until he glumly pronounces it pompous and pretentious. Finally, after further adjustments, he is satisfied with the result.

Pollack, an Oscar-winning Hollywood director, spent five years making this film about his friend. It is, of course, pro-Gehry, but not totally uncritical.

Hal Foster, an austere American academic who is none too enamoured of Gehry, delivers quite a critique. Another critic, dispensing altogether with verbal niceties, claims that some of Gehry's buildings are "extremely ugly."

But these are, so to speak, voices in the wilderness. For the most part, Gehry's admirers fill the screen with words of praise for him.

The writer Mildred Friedman compares him to an artist, the filmmaker Julian Schnabel likens his critics to "flies on the neck of a lion," and the television mogul Barry Diller voices amazement over his original talents.

All of them, without exception, admire his acute understanding of scale and light and his ability to translate hazy concepts into practical realities.

Gehry comes across as a complex, prickly figure who is both palpably insecure and seemingly arrogant.

In a meditative voiceover at the beginning of the film, he confesses that new projects frighten him. But once he embarks on a commission, he recovers his poise and his egotism kicks in. In this respect, as one of his friends comments, Gehry has the biggest ego in the business.

Gehry's longtime therapist, Milton Wexler, discloses that he lacks self-confidence, but does not elaborate.

Pollack, however, leaves a trail of useful hints. In Gehry's second year at university, one of his teachers cruelly informed him that he was not fit to be an architect, an observation that left him devastated but uncowed.

And in 1954, when he was 25, he changed his surname from Goldberg to escape anti-Semitism. Pollack does not cite any incidents that might have prompted Gehry to take so drastic a step.

We're told that he enjoyed "making things" with his hands, that his Jewish schoolteacher commended him for a drawing of the Zionist theoretician Theodor Herzl, and that his father, a truck driver, moved the family to California in 1947 for health reasons.

But beyond these unadorned facts, Gehry, as a person rather than an architect, remains something of a cipher.

Pollack could easily have eliminated some repetitive talking heads and replaced them with vivid background material about Gehry's formative years and his development as an architect. Nonetheless, Sketches of Frank Gehry is quite a feat of filmmaking.

CBC has a shallow encounter with Moses

Moses Znaimer, a founder of CityTV, Much Music and Bravo!, is Tajikistan's gift to Canada.

One of Canada's foremost media figures, he started life as an immigrant, arriving here with his parents from that Central Asian republic when he was barely out of diapers.

His mother and father, the only members of their respective families to survive the Holocaust in Nazi-occupied Europe, found refuge in Tajikistan, a mainly Muslim province of the Soviet Union, during World War II. They lived their until they immigrated to Canada in 1948.

Their experiences appear to have shaped Znaimer, the subject of Encounters with Moses, a CBC TV profile by Mike Sheerin scheduled to be broadcast Monday, June 26, at 8 p.m.

"His Jewishness defines him," says a former colleague who worked with Znaimer when he was young, brash, opinionated and too smart by half. As he reflects on his unusual past, Znaimer basically agrees with this assessment.

The biopic traces the arc of his career from the CBC to his current status as a media mogul, but since it is so brief, Sheerin can only skim over the surface. As a result, many details about his climb to the top are simply left out.

When Znaimer joined the CBC, he admits, he had "confidence to burn" and was blessed with a magnetic personality. In grainy clips from those days, he comes off as something of a smart aleck.

Speaking of CityTV, Znaimer observes that there was "a huge market" for a gutsy, upstart television station with "a sense of the street."

In the early years, when Znaimer was its dynamic creative force, CityTV produced an astounding 42 hours of original programming each week.

He was a visionary, says Jay Switzer, who succeeded Znaimer at City. Znaimer left in 2003 in what Switzer describes as "a turning of the page," but Saul Levine, Znaimer's friend, claims he was actually fired.

Asked to comment, Znaimer says he "mostly left." Then, in a pensive moment, he adds, "Nothing is forever."

As for his much talked about management style, Znaimer concedes that he is "a relentless improver of things." That sounds like an understatement.

It's also claimed that Znaimer's relationships with women are "the stuff of legend." A slightly bashful Znaimer acknowledges he has never concealed his "admiration and interest" in the fairer sex.

In the final moments of Encounters with Moses, he visits the offices of a Toronto classical radio station that he has just acquired.

Sheerin reveals bits and pieces about his elusive subject, but it's merely the tip of the iceberg.

Rembrandt's sympathy for Jews questioned by museum curator

By JESSICA FREIMAN
CJN Intern

The Jewish Bride by Rembrandt van Rijn (1606 — 1669)

Did the 17th-century Dutch artist Rembrandt van Rijn have a special place in his heart for the Jewish People? Does sympathy for them pervade his work? Was he a Protestant painter who "possessed a Jewish soul," as Israel's chief rabbi once said in the 1930s?

As the 400th anniversary of the birth of the Netherlands' greatest artist approaches, museum curator and author Edward van Voolen wishes to dispel the legend about the painter's relationship with Dutch Jews that many Jews along with non-Jews accept as fact.

Supposedly, Rembrandt learned about the Kabbalah from rabbis, painted a plethora of Jewish subjects, visited synagogues and attended Jewish weddings.

Such stories produced an image of a Rembrandt inspired by Jewish culture and fascinated with the Jewish people.

Speaking at the Art Gallery of Ontario recently, Van Voolen, the curator of the Jewish Historical Museum in Rembrandt's hometown of Amsterdam, said the idea of Rembrandt as a lover of the Jews is a myth.

It gained momentum because Rembrandt lived in the same quarter of Amsterdam as the Jews who had fled Spain and Portugal after the Inquisition a century earlier, he said.

In 17th-century Holland, Jews had the right to participate in international commerce and they could be shareholders of the Dutch East and West Indian companies.

During Rembrandt's lifetime, well-off Jews living in the Netherlands were not openly persecuted, so they were commonly seen in the streets of Amsterdam. Beautiful Portuguese and Ashkenazi synagogues, as portrayed in one of Rembrandt's landscapes of the harbour, were prominent features of the city.

"The visibility of Jews at this time and place contributes to the myth of Rembrandt as a friend of the Jews," van Voolen said.

"The next question becomes, did Rembrandt himself ever step foot in a synagogue?"

As a Protestant, Rembrandt was fond of painting scenes from the Hebrew Bible. His biblical works include Samson and Delilah (1628), Sacrifice of Abraham (1635), and Jacob Blessing the Sons of Joseph (1656).

The idea that Rembrandt loved Jews and had friendships with many of them gained momentum because of his interest in Bible stories, van Voolen said.

It is claimed that the synagogue depicted in Rembrandt's etching Pharisees in the Temple (1648) is modelled after a contemporary synagogue Rembrandt visited in Amsterdam.

"This work does not resemble the inside of any synagogue in Amsterdam," van Voolen said, proving his point by juxtaposing Rembrandt's etching with slides of synagogue interiors from 17th-century Amsterdam.

And what about the "Jewish garb" the subjects wear in the picture? "Jews in 17th-century Amsterdam wore the same dress and headgear as other people living in the city, like the fur hats and oriental turbans you see in this work [Pharisees in the Temple]," van Voolen said.

"We have no way of knowing if these were Jews or not. The subjects could be migrants from anywhere in Europe…"

In two instances, Rembrandt did paint Jewish subjects, van Voolen acknowledged.

The first is a portrait of Ephraim Bueno (1647), a physician and poet who had fled Catholic Spain and Portugal. "The portrait of Bueno is a real example of positive contact between Rembrandt and one Jew," van Voolen said,

The second Jewish subject painted by Rembrandt was the daughter of a rich Jew. "The Jew didn't like the portrait because he thought it did not resemble his daughter, so he sued Rembrandt," van Voolen noted.

Another famous Rembrandt painting supposedly depicts a Jewish woman, but according to van Voolen, she may not be entirely kosher.

In The Jewish Bride (1666), a woman stands in front of a man while he embraces her. The painting, originally titled The Couple, was renamed The Jewish Bride in 1833, more than 150 years after its completion.

"We have no way of knowing who this couple was," van Voolen said. "It could be Rembrandt's son and his wife, a husband and wife from the Hebrew Bible, or maybe they could be real people."

Van Voolen has some theories about why the pair was deemed Jewish.

"The intimate, warm gesture of the man's hand on the woman's belly might have made people think that the two are Jewish," he said.

The presence of a ring on the woman's index finger, where the Jewish wedding ring is traditionally worn, added fuel to the Jewish fire.

"Yet if you look at her other hand, the woman is plainly wearing several rings on other fingers," Van Voolen pointed out.

If you're in Amsterdam this summer for Rembrandt's 400th birthday, visit the Rijksmuseum and see The Jewish Bride. Is the "Jewish" Rembrandt historical fact or merely wishful thinking? See his work and decide for yourself.

Journalist shares cancer story in posthumous book

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Daniel Feist's unflinchingly candid articles in the Montreal Gazette about his determination to beat the lung cancer that ultimately killed him at age 51 touched untold numbers of people, as the hundreds of letters he received attest to.

Daniel Feist

The series ran from September to December 2004, and some of the letters and other tributes have now been published as a book, Cancer: My Story (CanWest Books), by Feist and Stan Shatenstein, his friend of more than 40 years.

Feist was a smoker who tried to quit many times. Shatenstein is a freelance journalist and editor specializing in exposing the health risks of smoking and the "murderous" tobacco industry.

The book's publication is both a memorial to Feist and a way get the message out that lung cancer causes the greatest number of cancer deaths in Quebec. It also furthers his goal of sharing his experiences with others in the same situation, and Shatenstein has added information useful to cancer patients.

A portion of the proceeds will be donated to the Jewish General Hospital's (JGH) division of pulmonary oncology and its palliative care unit.

Many relatives, friends and others who knew Feist through his writing gathered for the book's recent launch. They described an extroverted man who had a remarkable zest for life and who did not go quietly into that good night. As the poet Dylan Thomas counselled, he raged, but as his articles revealed, he did so with an irreverent sense of humour and a journalist's curiosity.

Feist was a longtime music columnist for the Gazette, specializing in the world music scene, as well as host of the Mix 96 radio program Rhythms International for 16 years. He was also a karate enthusiast, and a husband and father of two children.

He had a passionate interest in other cultures, particularly of the Caribbean and Africa. He also travelled extensively and had lived in Warsaw, Johannesburg and Botswana, where he worked in radio.

Soon after being diagnosed with lung cancer in the summer of 2004, he began to chronicle his experiences, not hiding the fears, pain, indignities and desperate hope. He died in February 2005.

"The word courageous is maybe used too often, but Daniel deserves it," said Dr. David Small, chief of pulmonary medicine at JGH. "I remember when he first came to my office. He was a force. He was going a mile a minute, asking me questions, some the most original I have heard in 20 years of treating people with lung cancer."

A desire to have some control over what was happening to him underlay his need for even the most arcane information, like what side he would wake up on after surgery, Small said.

"He made me promise a lot of things, including that he would make it through this. Unfortunately, I couldn't do that."

Dr. Bernard Lapointe, head of JGH's palliative care unit, where Feist spent his last weeks, said that to the end, Feist "lived each moment, convinced that every second was precious."

His mother, Ursula Feist, said that the younger of her two sons was born on Jan. 27 – Mozart's birthday – which may explain his perfect pitch. He was a noisy, rambunctious baby, "but to me pure joy."

The family had recently arrived from England, where leaving windows open all year round was normal. Here, though, three-week-old Daniel came down with pneumonia, and she remembered being at his hospital bedside every day.

He grew into "a mischievous, sensitive, curious child, who was never boring," and who hated authority and doing homework, but had many friends. One was Shatenstein, whom Feist met when the family moved next door to his in Cote St. Luc in 1964.

As an adult, Feist "often argued, was impulsive and impatient, often in an emotional turmoil," his mother said.

But he was a devoted son, calling almost every day or e-mailing when he was abroad, and "sending flowers for no particular reason."

Daniel was afraid of death, but tried to hide that from her, she said. "His death in the prime of life is a real tragedy, an insurmountable loss… The pain will never go away."

As Feist would probably have wanted, the book launch concluded with a few a cappella lines from jazz singer Lorraine Klaasen, a friend of his since she moved to Montreal more than 20 years ago from South Africa. She is grateful to Feist for helping her to establish her career here, giving her some exposure when she was not big enough to have her own manager.

This guy's got game: Israeli makes mark in Ukranian hoops

By YULIANNA VILKOS
JTA

KIEV, Ukraine — Israeli basketball player Afik Nissim doesn't like to play on Saturday for his Kiev team, but he recently had to do so for a big game.

"I try not to violate Shabbat, but basketball is the only thing I can make an exception for," said the 25-year-old, who was raised in a suburb of Tel Aviv. "If I have to travel with the team or play on Saturday, I do. It's my job, and I love it," said Nissim, who has played basketball since he was six years old.

Unfortunately, Nissim's team, BC Kiev, lost in the finals to Azovmash. But Nissim, who averaged just under 10 points a game this year, established himself as one of the key players on one of Ukraine's top teams.

A guard known for his outside shooting, the six-foot tall Nissim is the shortest player on the team. His height is not the only thing that makes him stand out. He's not the only foreigner on BC Kiev – in fact, the team largely consists of foreigners – but he is the only Israeli, and he's likely the only Israeli playing in any professional sport in Ukraine this year. No Israeli has ever played in the NBA, but a few have starred on U.S. college teams.

When Nissim arrived in Kiev earlier this year, his teammates were amazed at how little he ate and drank when they went out.

Nissim is not Orthodox, but he doesn't eat non-kosher meat and he is not keen on alcohol. He ate mostly vegetables when he first got to Kiev.

"My non-Israeli teammates would say, with sympathy, that it must be so difficult for me not to be able to eat everything," Nissim recalled. "But it's something that's normal for me and what I feel good about."

Nissim has been away from Israel for three years, playing for basketball teams in France, Rostov-on-Don, Russia, and now in Ukraine. Living far from home has made him more observant.

"When you are in Israel, you are like everybody else, and you don't think about these things much," he said. In Ukraine, he prays every morning and tries to go to synagogue in Kiev every week.

"Now, far away from Israel, holding on to my religion is the only thing that makes me closer to home," he said.

It was tough for him in Rostov, where the Jewish community is small and kosher meat was difficult to obtain. But in Kiev, Nissim seems happy.

His best friend in Ukraine's capital is the director of the King David, the city's only kosher restaurant, and Kiev's Central Synagogue is about 300 metres from the apartment that the team rents for him. Nissim may be the only player on the team whose diet requires that the team bring kosher meals on every road trip, but he says he doesn't feel very different or awkward about it.

And it doesn't hurt that BC Kiev's sports director and an assistant coach are Israeli, too.

Kahane had 25 years of experience coaching Israeli junior and national basketball teams when BC Kiev's owner, Aleksandr Volkov, invited him to Kiev.

Kahane says he's been friends with Volkov, a Ukrainian businessman and a former NBA player, since 1989.

"He needed somebody to be with the team 24 hours a day," said Kahane, who left a good job at the Israel Electric Company to work for BC Kiev.

Volkov established BC Kiev seven years ago with the goal of making it one of the top basketball clubs in Europe, Kahane said.

For the Israelis, language isn't a problem: The players and coaches speak to each other in English.

"Nationality in today's basketball doesn't really matter, as long as you've got a good player who fits in with the team," Kahane said.

Nissim said he's been fitting in well and is looking forward to next season, which starts in August.

"The only thing that bothers me is being far away from my family back in Israel," Nissim said. "So I spend a lot of time on the Internet and on the phone, and I hope my parents and my three brothers can visit me in Kiev next season."

Comedy, generosity in great form at Winnipeg sports dinner

By REBECA KUROPATWA
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — The president of the Rady Jewish Community Centre's board of directors has proclaimed the recent 2006 Y Sports Dinner the most successful yet, after close to 1,000 people showed up.

Keynote speaker was baseball legend Pete Rose, described by board president Jeff Lieberman as "very candid about his situation in baseball. He told a number of funny stories. People come to the dinner to be entertained, and he did a good job of it."

The annual dinner honoured 16-year-old fencer Maxwell Stearns as Winnipeg's Jewish athlete of the year and recognized the athletes set to represent the Rady JCC at the JCC Maccabi Games in Vancouver this summer. Stearns received $500 in prize money and a one-year membership to the Rady JCC.

Rose holds the all-time major league hit record, eclipsing hall of famer Ty Cobb's earlier mark of 4,191. By the time he ended his baseball career in 1986, Rose had totalled 4,256 hits, and he held the records for most games played (3,562), most singles (3,315), and most 200-hit seasons (10).

Pete Rose

Alonzo Bodden

[Rebeca Kuropatwa photos]

"It was a good thing I never played against [Babe] Ruth. If I did, I'd be dead," he quipped.

"When people talk about steroids, they always talk about Barry Bonds," said Rose. "Why? He is one of the best baseball players. It's the press who do it. Someone would have to prove it to me for me to ever believe it.

"I am the only guy in the United States who can't get a second chance," Rose said. "A guy was just let out of jail, and he [tried to] kill the Pope. I have a life suspension."

Comedian Alonzo Bodden, with a style of humour that he described as "cynically good-natured," had the audience in stitches. He opened with the line, "I can't tell you how amazing it feels to be the only black man in the room, on the podium, just before an auction is about to get started. I don't know if I should laugh or try to quietly slip out of the room."

The audience reacted with good-humoured applause. He joked that he came here "in the summer and hockey was still on the front page of the newspaper. Like, let it go guys."

On the subject of stepped up airport security in the United States, Bodden quipped, "We had one shoe bomber four years ago, and we still have to take off our shoes at the airport. My question is: where is the bra bomber?"

Funds raised at the dinner "help to underwrite costs for our senior adult centre and after-school and year-round children and special needs enrichment programs," said Sharilyn Johnson, executive assistant at the Rady JCC.

The auction included a $22,000 boat, a six-month lease on a new convertible, a sports weekend package in Toronto (including tickets to a Toronto Maple Leafs hockey game and a Toronto Raptors basketball game), and a round-trip travel package for four to Churchill, Man., to see polar bears. A silent auction and a rainbow auction rounded out the night's fundraising program.

Among the dignitaries to address the audience were Ernie Nairn, Ken Kronson, Winnipeg Mayor Sam Katz, Jim Daly, Paul Nusgart and Bob Picken.

Guilt leads to positive outcome

By MICHAEL GORDON

The Senior Side of Life

I was speaking at one of many presentations that have resulted from the publication of my book Parenting Your Parents, at a large Canadian multinational company. The audience consisted of 15 female, mostly middle-aged, employees.

As the presentation progressed, it was clear from the audience reaction that many of the topics resonated strongly among them. The topics of getting a proper geriatric assessment and the issue of guilt and its position in the equation of feelings that are shared between parents and their children were clearly of great concern.

It was acknowledged by the audience that feelings of guilt were quite pervasive among them. There seemed to be a challenge in what to do with guilt feelings and discussion centred around whether they promoted or interfered with the relationship with the aging parent, or ultimately resulted in better care despite the uneasy feelings related to this deep-seated emotion.

A member of the audience, an only child, recounted a recent experience in which she faced the challenge of arranging for an in-home geriatric assessment in the face of objections by her parents, who lived quite far from where she lived and worked. What drove her determination to get the assessment was that she could not provide the kind of care that she believed her parents, both still living with some difficulty in their home, needed to remain there.

She lived more than an hour's drive from their home. She spoke about her feelings of extreme guilt from having chosen to work in a place that was far away from her parents' home, for good career and personal family reasons, even though she knew it would present difficulties at some time in the future. Now, the future was at hand and she was racked with guilt for not fulfilling her duties as a loving daughter, even though she recognized her parents' strong feelings of independence and need for privacy. For these reasons, they had previously rejected an in-home geriatric assessment and expressed strongly that "it was not necessary" and that "they were fine."

Then the mother fractured her wrist in a fall, and the impact was substantial. She needed help in dressing, toileting and bathing. Her husband realized that he could not attend to her needs, especially the ones that required substantial physical effort and personal and private care such as toileting.

Fortunately, on relatively short notice, the local Community Care Access Centre (CCAC) was able to provide some in-home assistance and that, coupled with some private daily, helped the couple during the eight-week period before independence could be regained. But the involvement of the CCAC allowed the daughter to arrange for a geriatric assessment that now was welcomed by her parents even with some pride- and privacy-driven reluctance.

The daughter recounted what a beneficial impact the assessment had not only on home-safety changes but also on how some daily tasks such as shopping and cooking were structured. Most important, after the interaction and while the changes were being implemented, the father acknowledged to his daughter that the input from the "team," especially the assessment nurse, was "really good."

He went on to welcome future suggestions and care plans that he now understood would enhance the safety of himself and his wife and their ability to remain in their home. The daughter acknowledged that it was a long struggle, but now that the plan was implemented, the guilt she felt so deeply when trying to help her parents was partially assuaged. Guilt had led to a positive result, the most favourable outcome of that powerful emotion.

Epi on Education

Embracing Israeli culture in Toronto

Seymour Epstein

I recently attended a conference run by the North American Coalition for Israel Engagement (NACIE), a project of the Jewish Agency for Israel's Education Department. Toronto has just signed an agreement to be a partner community with NACIE, and this is one of a series of encounters planned to help us re-invigorate the relationship that the organized community has with Israel. While education, formal and informal, is one of the most important vehicles for this renewed relationship, this particular conference was devoted to the place of Israeli culture in a community such as Toronto – or Pittsburgh, or San Francisco.

There were a variety of discussions that ranged from the usual questions – What are the parameters of culture? What is Israeli culture? Is it Jewish? Are culture and religion separate endeavours, or are they related, even intertwined? What is the goal of introducing Israeli culture into our institutions, homes, and streets? Is it culture for culture's sake or something beyond that? What happens when it offends? to the practical issues of finding out what's available, when, and how to present it properly.

The conference ended with some challenging summary remarks by NACIE director Jonny Ariel in which he quoted a Toronto icon, the late University of Toronto English professor Northrop Frye. In noting Frye's four categories of literature – romance, tragedy, irony/satire, and comedy – Ariel stated that we usually present Israel in the first two modes, but find it more difficult to deal with the real Israel in terms of irony and comedy. While the mythic Israel requires romance and tragedy to tell the story, the up-to-date current Israel demands the addition of irony and comedy to deal with the more ambiguous and complex parts of the great narrative that is our homeland.

It was an excellent learning experience, and I hope to pass the lessons on.

Rediscovering the community's spirit

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

Where have our Jewish activists gone? What happened to the days of the Communist, socialist and conservative Jewish community members who courageously stepped out of their safe zone to protect and enhance the lives of our people and the community we live in?

Jews started unions; Jews busted them. We established community centres when nobody else would take us and even figured out a way to build a golf course when hateful cowards turned us away (they were likely afraid of our awesome putting game).

Where are those Jews, Jews with balls, who at Christie Pits fought off nasty anti-Semites threatening our safety and dignity?

What ever happened to those high-profile, fearless rabbis – the Rosenbergs, Slonims and Wertzbergers – who were brimming with leadership, and sometimes craziness, but were mostly unafraid of being castigated for having a different point of view?

Where are the Jewish students of old, the thousands who participated in university movements, the "radical" young men and women who thought nothing of challenging the organizations funding them in the name of social justice and were receptive to alternative approaches to Jewish issue and practice?

Where is our Jewish creativity? What happened to the many left-wing and right-wing journals, magazines and newspapers one could pick up at a Jewish or other bookstore in days not so long ago? What has happened to our Jewish writers? There are thousands of them, yet we mostly read the same content, style and writers that we did 20 years ago. Are we not sophisticated and strong enough to be challenged?

What about Jewish television and radio? How is that the Greek community, half our size, has had a Jewish radio station for years, and we only have two radio shows? We are a brilliant people who know well how to articulate ideas, and with more opinions than the American Congress on the abortion issue. Yet our use of the media is flat. We have become dull. Why?

Where is the Jewish coffee shop? I can't find it, unless I take a left on West End Avenue and 86th Street in New York. How great it would be if Jews of all ages could frequent a well-run, creative joint with local Jewish musicians (of which there are aplenty), and critique artwork on the walls painted or photographed by the flood of Jewish talent living in Mississauga and the Beach area, on Danforth Avenue and Bathurst Street, and in Thornhill and Richmond Hill, and other surrounding areas.

What ever happened to the intellectuals, artists, troublemakers and protectors that used to make the Toronto Jewish community oh so colourful? Where have they all gone? Why are the artists afraid or discouraged to come out and proudly show their wares?

We need to mix this place – our community up so that it is brimming with controversy, creative growth and life. Let's start by creating a fund to finance our very own Jewish coffee shop, or if that doesn't work, one of you entrepreneurs out there, step up and open one. Trust me, it would rock!

Rabbis, give us something to dig our teeth in. Hold open debates on issues that are pertinent, that challenge our intellects, and will encourage spiritual growth. Aren't you bored of the surfacy Jewish study and the one game in town that offers black and white Jewish thought?

Man, let's rediscover the spirit of the Toronto Jewish community and drop our fear of diversity; of showing our true selves. Let's build on a strong existent and wealthy structure to create a unique village unlike any other, one that will show the very real and colourful sides to what it means to be a Jew. Don't you think we need a real serious party?

A stunning, emotional experience

By MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
Editor

Bleary-eyed, our group of 27 editors from Jewish media around the world arrived at the old terminal at Ben-Gurion Airport on May 11 not much later than the sun did in the low eastern sky.

Editorial Feature

We were met there by a social worker with the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) and Boris Hellman, formerly of the Soviet Union, a thin reed of a man whose face is so angular he could have been a model for a cubist painter. Hellman works for the Ministry of Immigration. He has been on hand to see every oleh chadash – new immigrant – arrive in Israel since he began his employ with the ministry more than 20 years ago.

That morning, he was planning to receive a group of 80 olim who were expected at any moment to be landing merely metres away on a wide-open runway after a four-hour flight from Addis Ababa in Ethiopia.

Our group of editors was there to watch it all happen. The depth of the emotional experience that unfolded over the course of the next few hours stunned even the most veteran of the scribes among us.

We were privileged to witness the culminating moments of the rescue of these 80 Ethiopians.

No word other than "rescue" is appropriate. In Ethiopia, their fate would be of certain misery or worse. Yet no people other than the Jewish people care about their fate and no country other than Israel cares to take them in.

The photos by Keith Levit and Marcia Cantor, accompanying this article, show some of the faces of the individuals who were among the rescued and poignantly capture that shivering instant of tearful embrace when relatives reunite after so many years apart.

There is also a photo of a plaque installed among the rocks in the cemetery of Woloka near Addis Ababa. Its shiny brass proclaims the commitment from the Jews of the United Israel Appeal Federated Communities (UIAFC) of Canada to the Falash Mora of Ethiopia. It also enshrines the essence of Jewish peoplehood and encapsulates one of the sustaining existential strengths of Jewish history.

A group of 18 Canadians from Montreal, Ottawa, Halifax and Winnipeg had travelled to Ethiopia on May 8 to enable, support, assist and observe that rescue and returned to Israel with the new olim on May 11.

The decision in Israel to rescue the Falash Mora was not without controversy. They are descendants of the Beta Yisrael, the Jews of Ethiopia, disparagingly and derisively called falasha (strangers). But they were forced to convert to Christianity. Most of the Falash Mora tenaciously clung to cornerstone aspects of their faith and identity.

In the mid-1990's – after the breathtaking conclusion of Operation Solomon in May 1991 in which 14,310 Beta Yisrael were airlifted to Israel during a tense period of 36 hours – small numbers of Falash Mora began arriving in Israel. But an estimated 30,000 Falash Mora remained in Ethiopia. Still, some voices in Israel and in the Diaspora opposed the special efforts to bring them to Israel.

In 2003, then-Prime Minister Ariel Sharon ended the debate and declared that the government of Israel would rescue the Falash Mora, too. The United Jewish Communities (the federations of North America) decided to help in the rescue effort, pledging to raise $100 million (U.S.) for that purpose

Tribute to Israel

An incongruous, momentous sight

The 80-person group that arrived on May 11 was part of the 300 Falash Mora olim that Israel hopes to bring in each month. But to rescue the estimated 20,000 Falash Mora – now in a far more dignified manner called Zera Yisrael, the seed of Israel – remaining in Ethiopia before the agreement between the Jewish Agency for Israel and the government of Ethiopia expires in 2007, the government is determined to double the pace of rescue to 600 per month.

To qualify for immigration to Israel, the Zera Yisrael must have relatives in Israel who have petitioned for reunification with them; express a clear intention to return to their Judaism; and provide some manner of proof that they are in fact part of Zera Yisrael.

Today, some 105,000 Jews from Ethiopia live in Israel. The first wave arrived in 1984 in a rescue effort ordered by then-Prime Minister Menachem Begin, called Operation Moses.

But their absorption into Israeli society has not been easy. It has been marked by many social, educational cultural and economic problems. The older olim have very little chance of finding employment.

But in Ethiopia, the average life expectancy does not exceed 47 years. Twenty per cent of the population dies before they reach the age of five. The Gondar region, where most of the Beta and Zera Yisrael live, has been frozen in ancient times. The people live in huts whose floors are dirt, whose roofs are thatched straw and whose walls are made of dried cow dung. Running water is non-existent in their villages. Education is nil. And disease is rampant.

Micha Feldman and Mulu Allem

How could Israel not try to rescue the Falash Mora? And how could the Jews of the world not help Israel in that rescue?

The vile accusation so frequently leveled against Israel that it is an apartheid state is patently false and obviously contrived. Like a malodorous fluff of dust in a windstorm, it is blown away by the truth of Israel's compassionate caring for those whose lives matter not at all to anyone else in the world

* * *

Our group of editors is at the old terminal of the airport, the one no longer in use for commercial flights. It is familiar to us all from our former travel to and from Israel. But it is totally empty except for our group, our JAFI escort and Hellman. The signs, equipment and paraphernalia of the former airport are still in place, but the arrival halls, the departure halls, the duty-free shopping space, the restaurants are a vast hollow space. It is an eerie feeling.

We wait for the olim at a large glass door that opens up to an outside runway, where the buses used to pull up unloading their cargo of tired travellers to the Jewish state.

Our curiosity climbs.We fidget. We chatter. The excitement is palpable.

Then, just like in former times at this empty, retired terminal, two buses pull up alongside the curb.

They have arrived. We see a a sight that is at once incongruous and momentous. A huddled mass of tentative and wary strangers, much like Emma Lazarus might have envisioned when she wrote her famous poem, The New Colossus, walks slowly toward us in clusters we suppose of family units.

We hold open the two large glass panels of the old terminal's door, their gateway to a new life and a new, modern century.

We try to act naturally, as it were, and I suppose most of us do. We try not to gawk, although I suppose some of do. We try to contain our emotions for the moment brims with emotion, but most of us are overcome with a sense of surging happiness.

Walking past us very slowly on their way to a reception and documentation centre on the second floor of the hollow building are parents, children and grandchildren from Ethiopia dressed, for the most part, in formal evening wear. The men wear suits or jackets, kippot or other caps on their head; the women are in formal gowns; and the children, adorably, in various selections of cute high fashion for little people. They were given the clothes by the American Joint Distribution Committee the night before at the transit camp in Addis Ababa.

Our two groups look at each other with an awkward but comforting warmth. We smile at each other, they look straight at us, into our eyes, without guile or artifice. Shy, wary, they are wanderers no more.

Our JAFI guide reminds us that the flight from Ethiopia lasted about four hours but actually carried the travellers about 2,000 years forward in time.

In the reception room on the second floor, the olim begin the process of becoming citizens of the State of Israel. They also eat a meal of sandwiches and drinks. For all of them it is the very first time they see cellophane wrapping or juice boxes.

I meet Micha Feldman, JAFI's special envoy to the Jews of Ethiopia. Fluent in Amharic, Feldman moves among the group of olim like a respected, beloved older brother.

He introduces me to Mulu Allem, a 15-year-old dressed in basketball sweats and a jersey. Mulu's father died many years ago; his mother left him soon after. He is on his way to Natzrat Illit in the Galilee, where he will live with his paternal grandparents. His smile is so broad, it seems to reflect light onto my face. He teaches me to say "welcome home" in Amharic. Enkouan m'tachou.

Shy, wary, they are wanderers no more

Like an oversized wind-up bobblehead doll with a broken lever, I walk among the olim who are happily occupied with eating their novel meals and say to whoever will lift their eyes away from their food, Enkouan m'tachou. I am on my own private mission to greet everyone who has just arrived. They smile back at me politely, wondering, I am sure, if I was suffering from a nervous tic.

After they have completed their fast-food meal and the bureaucratic documentation, the olim again mount buses to get to the new terminal where their respective family members are waiting for them in the shopping-mall-like, high-ceilinged arrivals hall.

Our group of editors rushes by bus to the new terminal, now to join with the relatives anxiously awaiting the olim.

The wait is longer than expected.

I stand alongside 18-year-old Ania and her grandfather. He has not seen his son and grandchildren for nine years.

There is a sense of history unfolding as we struggle, once again, to contain the emotions stirring in our hearts.

Then the first of the 80 walks into the public space. Others soon follow. The scenes of reunion are like hot fingers caressing one's heart. People rushing toward each other, embracing, kissing, laughing, sobbing.

Before our increasingly bleary eyes, the abstract, the idea of rescue, has become real parents embracing their children and grandchildren.

The older members of this group of Falash Mora have arrived to end their days in a land where the sun does more than scorch human bodies or parch the earth. The younger ones will try to adapt to an entirely new life in an entirely new land in an entirely new civilization. The youngest, of course, will become part of the growing soil of the land, as natural to its ways, customs and language as a newly planted tree is to the forest it eventually joins.

* * *

Against the backdrop of the touching and tender scenes of reunion at the airport, some of the Canadians who travelled with the Ethiopian olim from Addis Ababa spoke to The CJN.

'Look at the lives we have saved'

"Witnessing first-hand part of the return from Ethiopia to Israel is beyond words," said Barry Cantor of Ottawa. "That we could contribute to this, helping bring Jews from all corners of the world back to Eretz Yisrael, is unbelievable."

"It was an adventure of a lifetime. We went to Gondar, and then the embassy compound in Addis and saw the schools that have been set up for the children. Then, being on the airplane flying together to Israel. I am so overwhelmed." His eyes welled with tears as he spoke to me. And so did mine as he was speaking and as we watched the families in disbelieving embrace.

Montrealer Stanley Plotnick, president of the UIAFC, said, "Ethiopia makes you remember what our responsibility is to other Jews. No one should have to live in conditions like the ones in which they live in Ethiopia.

"We have made a promise – and not in a small way that promise has made us – to rescue Jews in distress.

"To have left the Jews of Ethiopia there all those years is embarrassing. What took us so long? We cannot wait any longer to get people out."

With emotion rising in his voice and a sense of achievement peaking through he said, "Look at the lives we have saved. Within six months of their arrival in Israel, the life expectancy of the Ethiopian immigrant goes up to age 65. And when we save their lives, we are also saving the lives of the generations that follow.

"This is the responsibility of Jews to each other. Why should it be Israel's responsibility alone? It falls to Jews all over the world to save other Jews. Israel, thank God, is the place where Jews have their haven."

"It is about 600 miles from Gondar to Darfur," Plotnick pointed out. "It is devastating to think of what is being done to the people there."

Victor Goldberg of Halifax travelled to Ethiopia with his 19-year-old son, Eric.

"It is shocking to see such squalor there. And yet, only the State of Israel and the Jewish people are taking Jews out of Ethiopia or helping them while they are in Ethiopia, for example with health clinics, feeding stations, schools, and rescue co-ordination. One can only marvel at the work that the people there are doing. On a human scale, it is simply amazing."

In witnessing the drama of the homecoming and family reunification of the Falash Mora, many small ironies of Jewish life became evident. The Ethiopian olim were served their first cellophane-wrapped sandwiches by a woman from Ukraine.

The group that walked into the arrivals hall after the Falash Mora was from the former Soviet Union. The flight that preceded the Falash Mora was of birthrighters from Atlanta. Goldberg had also noticed this and commented on its significance.

"The birthrighters' link to their Judaism is just as tenuous as the Falash Mora, if perhaps not more so, than the newly arrived immigrants from Ethiopia," he said.

"That connected the dots for me; Israel is where all our lives join. It builds and reinforces our own identity."

Goldberg's son, Eric, celebrated his 19th birthday in Ethiopia. He recounted the following story: "The Israeli embassy staff in Addis Ababa had arranged for a large white, angel-food birthday cake to be baked for my birthday. It was cut into 80 pieces and each of the 80 olim received a piece. Of course, they had never seen, let alone tasted, anything like it before. Some of the olim, didn't quite know how to hold the cake. This is the best birthday I could ever have."

The Ethiopians celebrated Eric's birthday. But they also celebrated their own, too, as all of them said they would now count the day of their departure for Israel as a new beginning, a new date of birth.

Israel marks 25 years since Osirak

By DAN BARON
JTA

TEL AVIV — Twenty-five years ago, eight Israeli fighter pilots took off in their F-16s on a crucial and extremely dangerous mission that forever changed the Middle East.

The June 7, 1981, strike against Iraq's atomic reactor at Osirak, which many believed denied Saddam Hussein the bomb, has long been a case study in air power virtuosity.

Of late, with Western jitters building over Iran's nuclear ambitions, it is also being examined as a model for a pre-emptive action to deprive a dangerous regime of doomsday weaponry.

Israel has been celebrating the 25th anniversary of Osirak by lifting some of the secrecy over the mission.

The seven surviving pilots have been giving interviews, while real-time footage of the mission, captured by the planes' onboard cameras, was publicly broadcast.

"I felt that it was the future of the State of Israel on my shoulders," recalled Maj.-Gen. Amos Yadlin, a former F-16 pilot turned military intelligence commander.

At the time, of course, there was no place for triumphalism. Israel knew that no matter what the outcome, it would be accused by the international community of brinkmanship, even warmongering.

There were also U.S. ties to consider.

Israel had received its first fleet of F-16s from Washington by chance, after a shipment destined for Iran was cancelled in light of that country's Islamic Revolution in 1979. And despite the warplanes' advanced capabilities, getting them to make the round trip to Baghdad without support required a major gamble of Israeli technical ingenuity.

Israel was also in the midst of implementing its landmark 1978 peace accord with Egypt, and knew that this could be imperilled should Cairo choose to back an aggrieved Baghdad.

But for Israel's then-prime minister Menachem Begin, almost all risks were worth taking in order to ensure the continued survival of the Jewish state.

"We decided to act now, before it is too late," Begin would say. "We shall defend our people with all the means at our disposal."

Relik Shafir, who flew last in the eight-plane formation, would later confess that he expected to be killed by Iraqi ground fire, along with his wingman Ilan Ramon. As it happened, the late Ramon went on to an illustrious air force career, culminating in his appointment to become Israel's first astronaut on the ill-fated Columbia space shuttle mission.

Any small mishap might have ended the mission. The chief of Israel's air force at the time, David Ivry, said that one of his main concerns was that one or more of the F-16s would suffer a mechanical problem as they zoomed at an ultra-low altitude from a secret base in the then-Israeli controlled Sinai Desert across Jordan and Saudi Arabia and into Iraqi territory.

Menachem Begin

Then there were the freak glitches. A Mossad agent almost blew the mission when, in front of air crew servicing the F-16s, he dropped a briefcase full of Iraqi dinars that were to be given to the pilots to use for bribes if they were shot down. The formation was also spotted after takeoff by Jordan's King Hussein as he was holidaying on a yacht in the Red Sea. Thankfully for Israel, his efforts to alert Saddam about the incursion failed.

The Osirak mission went off almost without a hitch. The reactor core was destroyed in a surgical strike that was timed for a Sunday afternoon to reduce civilian casualties. The pilots made it home to the embrace of families that they had kept in the dark about the planned operation for months.

As predicted, there were condemnations across the board, from the United States to the United Nations to the Arab League. But no serious sanctions against Israel materialized, and some insiders recounted feelings of relief and sympathy in Western halls of power.

Richard Allen, U.S. national security adviser at the time, was the first to inform then-U.S. president Ronald Reagan of the Osirak strike. According to Allen, Reagan was nonplussed, but quick to quip: "Boys will be boys!"

Bereft of his prized, French-supplied reactor, Saddam ordered a secondary, secret nuclear program to be enacted. It was uncovered by the UN International Atomic Energy Agency in 1991. Few dispute that had the Osirak strike not been carried out, U.S.-led forces would have faced off with a nuclear-armed Saddam in the first Gulf War.

Ivry, who served as Israel's ambassador to Washington in the late 1990s, has a satellite image of the destroyed reactor that he received as a gift from U.S. Vice-President Dick Cheney. A handwritten note on the picture reads: "With thanks and appreciation. You made our job easier in Desert Storm."

Today's Iran, of course, is not Saddam-era Iraq. Its nuclear facilities are numerous, dispersed and fortified – a challenge that many foreign experts believe is beyond even Israel's formidable capabilities.

Patrick Cronin of the International Institute for Strategic Studies in London said that for Israel, "while tactically military options are not nil, they are close to nil" when it comes to Iran.

Yet while Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has backed U.S.-led efforts to curb Iran's nuclear program through diplomacy, like U.S. President George W. Bush, he has refused to rule out Osirak-like pre-emptive strikes.

A bluff? Anyone who knows is not saying.

But Ivry has suggested that some assessments of Israel's current military limitations are based on the wrong assumption that the objective would be to destroy Iran's capabilities.

"When Israel struck Osirak, the intention was never to get rid of Saddam Hussein's nuclear plans. We wanted to buy time, and we succeeded in doing that," he told Reuters last year.

"You cannot eliminate an idea, a national will. But you can delay progress on a nuclear program with the appropriate military action."

But surely, thanks to Osirak, Israel or its U.S. ally have lost the key element of surprise?

Ivry pointed out that the Osirak strike was not unprecedented, as Iraq's reactor had previously come under repeated attacks from its foe Iran. The secret, it seems, is in the audaciousness of the execution.

"If and when Iran is attacked, I think I can assure you it will come as a surprise to everyone," Ivry said.

Warren Buffett's Jewish connection

By CHANAN TIGAY
JTA

NEW YORK — Warren Buffett is not a Jew, and in fact describes himself as an agnostic.

Still, the billionaire investment guru, who last month made big news when his Berkshire Hathaway corporation bought an 80 per cent share in Israeli metalworks conglomerate Iscar for $4 billion (US), for years has been making his mark on the U.S. Jewish community back home – though sometimes in a roundabout way.

"Proportionally, if you look at the number of Jews in this country and in the world, I'm associated with a hugely disproportionate number," Buffett, the second richest man in the world, told JTA in a recent telephone interview.

Among the first companies Buffett acquired after launching Berkshire Hathaway, the Omaha-based investment and insurance giant, was the Sun Newspapers of Omaha, then owned by Stan Lipsey, onetime chairman of the Jewish Press, Omaha's Jewish newspaper. "At the time, the Omaha Club did not take Jewish members, and the Highland Country Club, a golf club, didn't have any gentile members," Lipsey recalls. "Warren volunteered to join the Highland" – rather than the gentile club – "to set an example of non-discrimination."

Buffett happily recalls the fallout from his application. "It created this big rhubarb," he says. "All of the rabbis appeared on my behalf, the ADL guy appeared on my behalf. Finally, they voted to let me in."

But that wasn't the end of the story, Buffett tells JTA. The Highland had a rule requiring members to donate a certain amount of money to their synagogues. Buffett, of course, wasn't a synagogue member, so the club changed its policy: members now would be expected to give to their synagogues, temples or churches.

But that still didn't quite work, Buffett recalls with a laugh, because of his agnosticism. In the end, the rule was amended to ask simply that members make some sort of charitable donation, and the path to Buffet's membership was clear.

"He's an incredible guy," says Lipsey, today the publisher of the Buffalo News. In 1973, the Sun won a Pulitzer prize in local investigative specialized reporting for an expose on financial impropriety at Boys Town, Nebraska.

"Warren came up with the key source for us knowing what was going on out there," Lipsey says.

Buffett himself researched Boys Town's stocks to bolster the story, Lipsey adds. In the 1960s, Omaha Rabbi Myer Kripke decided to invest in his friend Buffett's new business venture. Their wives had become friendly, he says, and the foursome enjoyed playing the occasional game of bridge together.

"My wife had no card sense, and I was certainly no competition to Warren, who is a very good bridge player and a lover of the game," Kripke, rabbi emeritus of Omaha's Conservative Beth El Synagogue, told JTA. "He's very bright and very personable and very decent. He is a rich man who is as clean as can be."

Rabbi Kripke, father of the noted philosopher Saul Kripke, bought a few shares in Berkshire Hathaway and quickly sold them, doubling his money, he says. Recognizing a good thing when he saw it, he bought a bunch more shares in his friend's company, shares that by the 1990s had made Rabbi Kripke – who says he never earned more than $30,000 a year as a rabbi – a millionaire.

Rabbi Kripke met his late wife, the children's book author Dorothy Kripke, at the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York, the flagship institution of the Conservative movement, where Kripke was ordained as a rabbi in 1937. In 1996, flush from their prescient investment with Buffet's company, the couple decided to make a major gift to JTS – $7 million in cash to restore the building's damaged tower, and a deferred gift of some $8 million, which the seminary will receive after Rabbi Kripke passes away.

"Rabbi Kripke had the heart to make a donation to JTS, he had the will to make a donation, he had the desire to make a donation – but if he had not had the means to make a donation, the recreation of our tower would never have happened," says Rabbi Carol Davidson, the seminary's vice chancellor for institutional advancement.

"It was really only possible because of their prior investment many years ago with Warren Buffett."

Rabbi Kripke – who says he's still got a picture of Buffett's late wife, Susan, on his bulletin board – concurs. Asked if he credits Buffett with his financial success, he doesn't hesitate.

"Entirely, yes," he says. "I never had much of an income."

The Israeli government stands to reap about $1 billion (US) in taxes on Buffett's purchase of Iscar. Shortly after announcing the deal, Buffett says he was surprised to learn that a Berkshire subsidiary, CTB International, was purchasing a controlling interest in another Israeli company, AgroLogic.

In Israel – which Buffett plans to visit in the fall – the hope is that the deals will have longer legs: Buffett himself has not ruled out future purchases there and, considering his status as a leading investor, observers say others also may take a look at Israeli companies now that Buffett has done so.

"You won't find in the world a better-run operation than Iscar," Buffett says. "I don't think it's an accident that it's run by Israelis."

The Sun newspaper group was not Buffett's only early purchase of a Jewish-owned company. In 1983, sealing the deal with a handshake, Buffett bought 90 percent of the Nebraska Furniture Mart from Rose Blumkin, a Russian-born Jew who moved to the United States in 1917.

In 1989, he purchased a majority of the stock in Borsheim's Fine Jewelry and Gifts, a phenomenally successful jewelry store, from the Friedman family.

"He has many friends in the Jewish community," says Forrest Krutter, secretary of Berkshire Hathaway and a former president of the Jewish Federation of Omaha.

Buffett's former son-in-law, Allen Greenberg, is a Jew, and now runs the Buffett Foundation, much of whose work has dealt with reproductive rights and family-planning issues. Buffett's personal assistant is Ian Jacobs, who goes by his Hebrew name, Shami. Buffett himself counts the late Nebraska businessman Nick Newman and philanthropist Jack Skirball as among his "very closest friends."

"He is very much honoured in the Jewish community," Rabbi Kripke says.

Asian electronics firms investing in Israeli startups

By JOEL BAINERMAN

Not too many Asian multinationals invested in Israeli technology in the past 15 years, but that situation is changing.

Now that they want access to Israel's unique technology, more Asians are investing in Israeli startups.

THE ISRAELI INVESTOR
By JOEL BAINERMAN

Nippon Venture Capital Corporation has made a direct investment in the Israeli digital pen startup, Pegasus Technologies. Hitachi Ltd. invested in the company in 2002.

Pegasus has developed an electronic pen that captures natural handwriting on any surface onto any computing device in real time. The company's product line includes handwriting capture devices for personal computers, personal digital assistants and cellphones. The devices are available either as an accessory to a computing device or as an embedded chipset solution.

Another Japanese multinational, Fujitsu, has participated in an $8-million round of investment in ASOCS, an Israeli fabless semiconductor startup company.

ASOCS is developing a baseband chip that supports multiple wireless technologies and standards. The technology will enable cellphones to access a wireless network anywhere in the world, and will also support fixed mobile convergence with only a single processor. Currently, at least two processors are necessary for this purpose.

The technology will enable companies such as Nokia, Samsung and Motorola to introduce different cellphone models using the same platform. At present, cellphone makers must produce separate platforms for each wireless technology, which substantially increases their costs. ASOCS is also in talks with Fujitsu for manufacturing the baseband chip.

Another Asian electronics firm, Taipei, Taiwan-based Inventec Appliances, is working with Siano Mobile Silicon, an Israeli fabless manufacturer of integrated semiconductor receivers for mobile digital television (MDTV). They will be focusing on the integration of Siano's semiconductor MDTV receivers into multiple products produced by Inventec, such as cellphones and other smart hand-held devices.

Asian multinationals are not the only companies investing in Israel's tech industry. The region's financial investors are investing, too.

Last month, Tel Aviv-based Platinum Neuron Ventures signed an agreement to set up an $80-million venture capital fund with China's Shenzhen Capital Group, to invest in joint ventures between Israeli and Chinese startups.

Also attracting Asian financial investors

Another Israeli venture capital fund, Infinity Venture Capital Fund, has teamed up with China's China-Singapore Suzhou Industrial Park Venture Co. to create a fully dedicated, $75-million "China-Israel" fund. The fund was the first venture capital fund registered in China, having received the licence number 00001 from the Chinese government in June 2005.

The Infinity-CSVC Fund has invested $15 million in a Chinese plant being established by Jerusalem-based Shellcase, which makes packaging for digital consumer products and telecom infrastructure markets.

"Shellcase was doing manufacturing and R&D in Jerusalem. But you cannot manufacture for the Far East in Jerusalem," Amir Gal-Or, managing partner of the fund, said.

"So the research and development will remain in Jerusalem and the manufacturing in China. This is a good business model for other Israeli companies to emulate and an excellent way for Israeli technology-based firms to penetrate the vast Chinese market."

Ecological projects underway to save Israel's rivers

By EDGAR ASHER

Compared to most countries in the world, especially in view of its size, Israel is a country with an extraordinary variety of scenery, climate, flora and fauna. But Israel has few rivers. Moreover, none of the rivers that flow in the Jewish state is commercially navigable except in crafts with shallow drafts. And even then, only a few kilometres of the rivers can be used and only at certain times of the year.

Many rivers, nahalim in Hebrew, dry up completely in the summer months. Even in the winter, the rivers are dry most of the time and become short-lived torrents of water only in the desert regions during the winter rainy season.

The rivers where there is water all year round are mainly on the coastal plain or flow into northern Israel from Lebanon. But even in these, the flow is reduced during the summer months and the rivers become shallow streams.

When there is water, the rivers are polluted, since most of them have been receptacles for industrial and human waste. This created a situation where they could not support fish, could not be used for drinking water and were not suitable for recreation.

Another concern is that Israel's rivers have been tapped, usually at source, for their potable water. The Yarkon and Jordan Rivers are prime examples of this.

The Yarkon River, from its source in Petach Tikvah, used to flow strongly down to the sea until most of its water was utilized for drinking and agriculture. But the Yarkon became more and more polluted as its flow and level dropped.

Softshell turtle once again breed in the area.

In 1997, a footbridge across the Yarkon at Ramat Gan collapsed during the Maccabiah Games, throwing several Australian athletes into its stagnant waters. Two athletes died and many who swallowed the river water became seriously ill.

This accident brought to the attention of the public the critical situation of Israel's rivers, and although the clean-up had already started some years earlier, it was clear that the process had to be accelerated.

Nahal Alexander, which runs into the Mediterranean between Netanya and Hadera, is one of the country's longest and now most attractive waterways. Like the other rivers, it suffered from heavy pollution, but in 1994, the Alexander River Restoration Administration was created. With the cooperation of the Palestinians, a program was launched to reverse the degradation of the river, with the aim of making it attractive for visitors and clean enough to support fish.

Area rich in flora and fauna

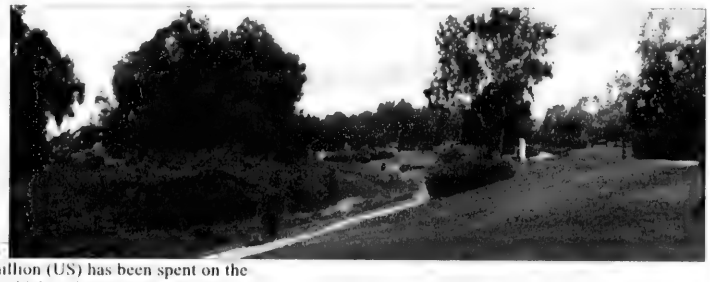
The Alexander flows year round and now supports a wide variety of vegetation and animal life along its banks. It also has a significant population of soft-shelled turtles, the largest species of freshwater turtles in the world. They can weigh up to 50 kilograms each.

The river is administered by the Israel Nature & National Parks Authority (INNPPA). Over the past 10 years, the quality of its water has improved to the extent that fish once again breed there and the unique population of turtles is flourishing.



Above, shallow dams, called riffles, help aerate the water in the river. The views from along many vantage points of the river are delightful and scenic. [Israel photos]

At one time, it was thought that the turtle population was nearing extinction, but now, thanks to the INNPPA intervention, they are no longer considered to be in such danger. About $2 million (US) has been spent on the first stage of the project, which includes sewage treatment pools.

Another INNPPA innovation has been the placing of large stones in strategic places across the width of the river to create shallow dams about 20 centimetres deep, called "riffles." The flow of the river over the riffles aerates the water while still allowing the fish to swim easily up and down the river.

The most attractive and interesting part of the river is a landscaped section about ten kilometres from the sea, known as Italy Park. It can be reached by an unobtrusive, paved footpath that runs beside the river. The area is rich with birds, flowers, fish and reptiles and offers delightful, scenic views from many vantage points.

About four kilometres from the sea along the river is the turtles' main habitation. A bridge crosses the river here, and observation balconies have been built to enable strollers to observe the turtles and enjoy an extended view of the scenery beyond the river.

The Alexander River project is one of several now underway to improve Israel's ecology. It has been an unquestionable success and is regarded by many as the standard by which to measure other ecological efforts.

The other projects, including the Kidron River project near Haifa, still have a long way to go. Industrial toxic waste is still finding its way into the river, despite the fact that it is illegal to dump waste into it.

In time, however, with goodwill, determination and co-operation, all of Israel's water resources will be given a newer, cleaner life, like Nahal Alexander.

Teen to conduct research with Israeli scientists

By JESSICA FREIMAN
CJN Intern

Toronto high school student Simon "Shimmy" Bromberg is preparing for anything but a regular summer vacation.

Soon he'll be on his way to Jerusalem for six weeks of scientific research alongside some of Israel's leading academics.

Bromberg, 17, is one of 30 high school students from North America chosen to participate in the Legacy Heritage Internship for Young Scientists. The W. L. Mackenzie Collegiate Institute student will be based at Hebrew University in Jerusalem this summer and will get the opportunity to work with world-renowned leaders in their respective fields, including Itzchak Parnas in molecular neurobiology, Avishai Dekel in astrophysics and cosmology, Shabtay Dover in molecular biology, and Eshel Ofir in animal physiology.

"Science has always been one of my favourite subjects," said Bromberg, who departs June 25. "It's been clear since the start of high school that a career in the sciences is the way I'll end up going."

Bromberg names biology as his favourite topic in science, "although there is no one area that is not interesting to me," the Grade 11 student said.

"I find biology especially interesting because it can give you a new understanding of the world around you.

"Chemistry is a close second."

Predictions for Arab rapid population growth are wrong

By BENNETT ZIMMERMAN, ROBERTA SEID and MICHAEL L. WISE
JTA

"Arab demographic momentum" has become part of the Israeli lexicon.

According to this theory, the Arab sector, with its rapid population growth, will soon overwhelm the Jewish population, as "baby boom" generations of Arabs give birth to an even greater number of children. Arab births will accelerate even if birth rates remain stable or drop slightly because such a large number of women will enter their childbearing years.

But the evidence is now in, and it shows something surprising: demographic momentum indeed exists – but among Jews, not Arabs.

Jewish births grew rapidly, from 80,000 per year in 1995 to 96,000 in 2000 and to more than 103,000 in 2003. The demographic outlook for Jews has been improving because the Jews' total fertility rate, or the number of children a woman is likely to bear over her lifetime, has been rising.

In 2005, the Jewish fertility rate reached 2.7, the highest of any advanced industrial nation. While the fervently Orthodox contributed to this rise, secular Israelis and immigrants from the former Soviet Union also experienced increasing fertility.

When returning Israelis who have lived abroad – an average of 20,000 per year from 2001 to 2004 – and aliyah are added to the mix, the demographic weight of the Jewish sector grows even further.

In contrast, the absolute number of births in the Israeli Arab sector grew from 36,500 in 1995 to 40,800 in 2000. After rising slightly to a record 41,400 births in 2003, the number of Israeli Arab births fell in 2004 for the first time, back to 40,800.

The overall Israeli Arab fertility figure – which includes Muslims, Christian Arabs and Druze – declined from 4.4 in 2000 to 4.0 in 2004.

Israel recently enacted policies that are impacting the highest fertility sectors of the Arab population. In 2004, the government stopped granting stipends for every child born to a family, restricting them to the first two children. There was an immediate drop in Bedouin pregnancies.

The problem with demographic predictions is that they apply yesterday's or today's fertility rates to tomorrow's forecast. However, earlier childbearing patterns may have little relationship to the number of children the next generation will have.

Applying Muslim fertility rates from the 1960s – nine to 10 births per woman – Israeli demographers had projected that Israeli Arabs would overtake Israeli Jews by 1990.

When the fertility rate dropped to 5.4 in the early 1980s and 4.7 in the second half of the decade, demographers applied this rate to their next series of forecasts. However, by 2005, the Arab fertility rate had dropped even further, echoing dramatic drops reported throughout the Middle East, where most nations display fertility levels of about three births per woman.

Furthermore, Israeli Arab women now in their 20s won't necessarily repeat the childbearing characteristics of their older counterparts. Israeli Arab women who are having fewer children in their late teens and 20s might also have fewer children in their 30s than do today's 30-year-olds, who still display the fertility characteristics of earlier generations.

In contrast, Israeli Jewish women in their 20s who are having more kids might carry that choice into their 30s at rates above those of current 30-year-olds.

The practice of forecasting tomorrow's population growth from yesterday's rates is a common mistake. The United Nations' Population Division predicted in 2000 that the world's population would balloon to 12 billion people by 2050. Four years later they dramatically revised the forecast, and now predict that today's global population of 6.3 billion will plateau at 9 billion by 2050.

With constantly changing birth patterns, what's a forecaster to do? To have any relevance, a forecast must constantly be updated with the most current information and to reflect any changes in trend.

The Gallup organization recently published the results of a survey that showed a convergence in desired family size among Jews and Arabs west of the Jordan River. The ideal family size has fallen to 5.1 for Arabs in Gaza and 4.5 in the West Bank. The desired family size among both Israeli Jews and Israeli Arabs is now 3.7.

While Gallup found no difference in the preferred number of children among younger Israelis, younger West Bankers, 15 to 19, believe an ideal family should have 4.1 children, compared to relatives over 50 years old, who believe the ideal family should have 5.0 children.

The convergence in desired birth activity among Israeli Jews and Israeli Arabs, and particularly among younger West Bankers, is likely to further impact the future demographic outlook for Israel and the West Bank, where Jews now form a two-thirds majority.

Demographers who concentrated on past patterns in the Arab population missed the evidence of a slowdown in the Arab sector and the demographic revolution occurring among Jews. By focusing on the past, forecasters anticipated demographic momentum in the wrong sector and produced an outlook that couldn't even get the present correct, let alone the future.

Captain Kirk helps disabled Israeli children

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

TEL AVIV — William Shatner's eyes grow wide recalling the sight of an Israeli quadriplegic blind boy jogging a horse around a ring.

The eight-year-old learned to ride at a therapeutic riding centre. The centre is one of about 30 in Israel that will benefit if the Montreal-born-and-raised television star and his fourth wife are successful in raising $10 million (US) as part of an initiative, launched with the Jewish National Fund, to help children with disabilities.

"Horses make miracles," said Shatner, who was in Israel last month, translating from an alliterative Hebrew slogan. "We've fallen in love with that phrase."

The couple is hoping that horses will help create even more miracles by bringing together disabled children from Israel, the Palestinian areas and Jordan.

William Shatner

This is about "using horses as a tool to forget differences," said Shatner, who is Jewish. He first found fame as Captain Kirk on Star Trek and has recently returned to TV success playing lawyer Denny Crane on the hit show Boston Legal.

"We are extending a hand to say we want to help kids. We want to help Israeli Arabs, Palestinians, Bedouin, Druze – whose only common denominator is that they are children," Shatner said. "It's about extending a hand of peace as well as healing handicapped minds and bodies."

While in Israel, Shatner and his wife, Elizabeth, both avid horseback riders, visited several of the main therapeutic riding centres in the country, from the Galilee to the Negev Desert.

The benefits of riding for people with disabilities are vast. Horseback riding moves the rider's body in a gentle and rhythmic way, as the horse moves in a similar way to the human gait. Riders who have physical disabilities from accidents, terrorist attacks or disease often improve their flexibility, balance and coordination.

Those with mental or emotional disabilities often benefit from the patience and self-esteem they get from forging a connection with the horse.

It's also about self-confidence. For people in wheelchairs, for example, suddenly finding themselves high in the air on a horse can be an image-altering experience. For them, the horses become their legs.

"This is all a result of a horse that has managed to take them out of themselves," said Elizabeth Shatner, who has worked with horses for years.

One of her and her husband's most memorable moments on the visit was meeting a teenager whose mental disabilities make it difficult for him to speak. While sitting on a horse near them, he blurted out in perfect English, which no one realized he spoke, "I love to ride horses."

[illegible] sive. The horses they ride must be trained very well, and each rider has several trainers accompanying him or her during the ride.

The William Shatner/Jewish National Fund Therapeutic Riding Consortium Endowment for Israel aims to raise $10 million to support the some 30 therapeutic riding centres in Israel and provide scholarships for children.

The idea to help the centres in Israel started over a lunch at a Los Angeles diner between Shatner and his old friend Marvin Markowitz. Markowitz, a real estate developer and a major JNF donor, suggested Shatner bring his interest in therapeutic riding to Israel.

"Jerusalem existed in the Haggadah. That's all I knew. Now suddenly we are here," he said.

Combining science and Judaism

The Legacy Heritage Internship, a fully subsidized scholarship program, will give Bromberg an experience that few high school students can even dream of: the chance to work in a real research laboratory before deciding what to study in university.

"I'll get to experience what it's like to work in a lab and be a researcher before I have to make the choice if that's what I want to do or not."

'It's probably the best way I could spend a summer'

In addition to encouraging the continuation of scientific studies, the internship is designed to strengthen the students' Jewish identities and ties to Israel.

Bromberg feels that his own Jewish identity has been strengthened by his involvement with National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY). Recently, he was appointed vice-president of education on the NCSY regional board.

The internship will mark Bromberg's first visit to Israel, and he's not sure what to expect.

"I do know that it should be an amazing experience, because not only will I be involved in a lot of modern scientific endeavours, I'll also be experiencing many aspects of Israel's culture and Jewish religion, and other areas of Judaism across the country."

Bromberg is especially thankful to the funders of the Legacy Heritage Internship. "These are Jewish families supporting the community. The trip is a full scholarship and is very expensive for 30 students. It comes from generous people throughout North America," he said.

"Throughout high school I've been becoming more religious and observant on a bigger scale. This Israel program popped up as a perfect opportunity to combine the two main things in my life: science and Judaism.

"It's probably the best way I could spend a summer," Bromberg said.

What an Incredible Year...

In Fact, 40 Years!

It has been an incredible and extraordinary year for me to have the privilege of serving as the president of UIA Federations Canada, the central address of Jewish Canada and partnership with Israel!

I'm fortunate to have this opportunity to lead our incredible organization as we celebrate UIA Canada's 40th Anniversary... forty years of helping to build, support and bond with the people of Israel... forty years of outstanding success.

We recently celebrated our achievements in Israel during Yom Ha'Atzmaut, as we hosted an extraordinary festival for more than 750, including 7 Canadian missions and friends from Australia, France, Venezuela and Israel.

We have made a real difference, both to the people of Israel as well as to our communities and the next generations. Canadian Jewry has contributed to the aliyah and absorption of more than 1,000,000 olim from the FSU, Iran, Iraq, North Africa, and Ethiopia. We have helped rescue Jews from distress, and in turn they are contributing to the future success of Israel.

In Israel, we have supported the social needs of Israelis, and particularly educational and youth-at-risk programs that focus on the specific and extraordinary needs of the people in the periphery... the Negev and Galil. We have stood with the people of Israel, in good times and tragic times, with thousands of Canadians visiting Israel at all times, even during the height of the Intifada, reaffirming our bond, and solidifying our partnership.

And... we have committed to doing more for the future. We gladly accept our share of responsibility for the State of Israel, the homeland and haven of all Jews; the only country in which we will always be welcomed. And, we recognize how much more there is to do.

As we visited nearly 14,000 Ethiopians awaiting their chance to emigrate to Israel, we witnessed the devastating poverty, overwhelming sickness, and unbelievable squalor in which these people are forced to live. We, the Jewish people, can, and will save them. And they, particularly the younger generation, will ensure continued vibrancy and prosperity for Israel.

We have also achieved so much in Canada. Having visited every Canadian Federation and met with the leadership, I have been overwhelmed by the achievements of each. UIAFC has played an exciting role in impacting lives across Canada. Youth and adults have been touched by missions to Israel, by campaign support, programs for the next generation and enhancing Jewish identity, and the impact of a greatly enhanced program of advocacy, both regionally & nationally.

As I listened to the needs across Canada, I realized that we can do even better. We are evaluating every program, examining our governance, exploring our funding formulas, and leaving no stone unturned to ensure that what needs to be done is being done... effectively and efficiently.

As we celebrate our 40th year, and bid au revoir to our dear friend, leader and exceptionally talented colleague Maxyne Finkelstein, thanking her for all that she has accomplished over the last 6 years, we welcome our new Executive Vice President, Linda Kislowicz, to carry on the enormous success.

We are blessed with talented, dedicated and generous professionals and volunteers who will ensure we continue to go from strength to strength.

Thank you for the privilege of being a part of this incomparable team.

Canadians Celebrate 40 Years of Living Generously

UIA Federations Canada recently commemorated its milestone 40th year in Israel, while celebrating Israel's 58th Independence Day. UIA was born at a time of great drama and peril for the Jewish people. In 1967 the response of the Canadian Jewish community for the Emergency campaign was nothing short of miraculous. The financial support of the Canadian Jewish community towards Israel was overwhelming, necessitating the organization of a united and efficient body to oversee our efforts in Israel.

Since then, the Canadian Jewish community has time and again risen to the challenges of Israel's growth and success. From the six-day war through to today's Operation Promise – UIA has always offered a superb fundraising response to historical events and will always continue to support Israel.

Collectively, Canadian Jewry has established more than 240 physical projects in 85 locations throughout Israel, and funded more than 1,000 programs assisting the vulnerable. Canadian projects throughout Israel include the building of libraries, auditoriums, kindergartens, community centres, sports facilities and other projects that benefit Israelis of all ages.

"Canada's partnership with Israel is a long, exciting and proud relationship that has yielded wonderful benefits to both Canadians and Israelis," says Stanley Plotnick, president of UIAFC. "Our 40th anniversary is clearly a promise of our dedication to the future of Israel. We are here as one family, together forever."

Shaping the Face of Israel in Canada

The overarching strategy of shared values between Canada and Israel, based on scientific public opinion data, has shaped the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) and its family of agencies in the undertaking of a number of successful national campaigns. In the past year, coordinated programs have been implemented to strengthen the Canada-Israel relationship and the interests of the Jewish community in Canada.

- CJC and NJCL have generated public and student support as well as vital media and government attention for the victims of Darfur through public rallies and the Green Ribbon campaign.
- National student conferences, held in Vancouver, Montreal, and Halifax, have introduced new supporters of Israel to the world of Jewish advocacy and have coached activists to ensure a vibrant, safe campus community for Jewish students, working to build future advocacy leadership.
- In Quebec, QIC has reached out to government and media to communicate the Jewish community's ongoing commitment to Quebec cultural, health, and business institutions.
- CIJA and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto have partnered in carrying our messages to prominent non-Jewish audiences of business and political leaders through the first Words & Deeds Leadership Award Dinner in Toronto.

The foundation of a successful advocacy program is based on access to and relationships established with key political decision-makers. As the 39th Parliament settles in, we can take a measure of pride in CIJA's positioning, which reflects its solid strategic planning over the last three years.

This past year saw many Parliamentarians and political staffers visit the State of Israel through Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) Parliamentary missions. Other CIC missions directed at opinion leaders also help to promote and advance the relationship between Canada and Israel.

Through the work of various agencies, CIJA represents our efforts to translate the community's advocacy agenda into tangible results. Greatly enhanced by CIJA's investment in the missions program, we're able to make magnificent strides in shaping the future of Canada-Israel relations.

Charles Bronfman, UIAFC Honorary President, in Israel surrounded by Canadian youth on a Taglit-birthright israel visit

Shalom Friends,

I am pleased to congratulate you on your outstanding accomplishments over the past 40 years. I have personally witnessed the evolution of UIA Federations Canada into a leading organization serving the needs of Jewish Canada, Israel and world Jewry. Your ongoing dedication and commitment to our people and homeland is what gives us a special bond and passion for what we hold so dear.

This summer, will mark Taglit-birthright israel's 100,000th participant in Israel. As you know, this program holds a special place in my heart, yet is just one of the many initiatives UIAFC and the Canadian Federations support that help to strengthen Jewish identity. Taglit-birthright israel has had a profound and lasting impact on Jewish youth and their identity, resulting in more positive attitudes towards Israel, Judaism and the Jewish people.

I'm always touched when I see birthright israel groups from around the world meeting and imagine the impact on each as they experience Israel in a new light. However, when I see the Canadian flag among the groups, it especially warms my heart. I thoroughly enjoy being invited to share Kabbalat Shabbat with fellow Canadians at the Old City.

Even around Israel, when you mention the words Taglit or 'birthright,' people's eyes light up. To me, it's an astonishing success. Another astonishing success is Jewish Canada's wholehearted dedication to Israel through the work of UIAFC.

It is my pleasure to join you in celebrating your successes.

Best Regards,

Charles Bronfman

Touching the Hearts, Minds and Souls of the Next Generation

Canada Israel Experience (CIE) was born of the collective vision to strengthen Jewish identity among Jewish youth and young adults across Canada, and continues to be an international leader in the field of Israel Experience programming and informal Jewish/Zionist education.

For the second straight year, CIE will, CIE will send over 3,000 young Jewish Canadian adults to Israel through its many programs. Taglit-birthright israel, a cornerstone program, reaches out to Jewish youth who have never been to Israel on a peer experience. Highlights of this summer's program will include the Cuba/Canada and British/Canadian Mifgash (encounter) and the celebration of Talgit-birthright israel's 100,000th participant who will arrive in Israel this summer.

On Yom Ha'Shoah, close to 700 Canadian March of the Living (MOL) participants marched from Auschwitz to Birkenau honoring the memory of those who perished under Nazi rule. The Canadian MOL program is instrumental in building a strong Jewish identity in our youth and teaching the lessons of the Shoah. Holocaust survivor and hidden child, Anita Ekstein of Toronto chaired this year's March, and along with 12 other Canadian Holocaust survivors, shared her personal story with the young people throughout the trip.

This year CIE worked with Jewish schools across the country and this has resulted in community high school Israel experience programs from schools in Vancouver, Edmonton, Calgary, Winnipeg, Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal. CIE has also undertaken to be the local partner of MASA in Canada, a unique partnership between the Government of Israel and the Jewish Agency, which aims at increasing the number of young Jewish adults spending time on long-term programs in Israel.

Offering innovative and creative programming, CIE and the Israel experience professionals across the country are planning and delivering a wide variety of programs for potential participants and post programming for alumni. Under the leadership of Dale Boidman, Chair of the CIE Management Committee, we're looking forward to another successful year of building tomorrow's Jewish community leaders.

Campus Leadership Mission

Training Campus Advocates: Zionism Inside and Out

"An organization has achieved a measure of success when its strategies become part of the organizational culture." The Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), through the leadership of the Canada Israel Committee, has placed "Shared Values" at the centre of its advocacy agenda - and the message is spreading.

National Jewish Campus Life (NJCL), along with the other CIJA agents, has embraced and integrated "Shared Values" into campus advocacy strategies across Canada. The large majority of student leaders and student groups advocating for Israel have embraced this framework and the results are positive.

Students are now articulating the values that Canada and Israel both hold dear and are able to contextualize them so that they make sense to other students. Many students have become quite effective in using the "Shared Values" approach to advocacy, working with the media to obtain positive coverage of Israel, while others are focusing their attention on students who are open to learning about the Middle East in an intellectually honest manner.

Now that our students are communicating the values that Canada and Israel share, it is time to educate them further on the factors that make Israel special and unique. Our advocates need to understand the history of Zionism, the spectrum of Zionist thought and most importantly why they are Zionists.

As more and more students are making the connection of how Israel and Canada are similar, they must also be educated as to why Israel is special and unique.

It is clear that Israel, Jewish identity, advocacy and leadership are interconnected. NJCL will be dedicating significant professional, financial, and programmatic resources this year toward leadership development and Zionist education. In doing so, the Canadian Jewish community is preparing students to be the most effective, eloquent, knowledgeable, and passionate advocates in the world.

A Home Away from Home
for Jewish Students

The Albert and Temmy Latner Foundation has established three Jewish student centres on or near the campuses of Dalhousie University, Wilfred Laurier, the University of Waterloo and the University of Western Ontario.

Albert Latner's investment investment in the infrastructure of Jewish campus life has proved to be invaluable. Latner Centres provide a physical space for a large range of programs and activities including Shabbat and Holiday celebrations, socials, educational events, Hebrew classes, meetings and more. But most important, the Latner Centres have become homes for Jewish students when they are away at university. They have become places of comfort and serve as the foundation for building Jewish life on campus.

A student at Dalhousie University expressed the impact of the Latner Centre, (otherwise known as "bayit", which translates to "home" in Hebrew):

"Every community needs a solid centre, which serves as a common reference point to all of its members. This is what the Bayit has meant to us. The Bayit is essentially a magnet, as it gathers together the many disparate Jewish students of the Halifax student community. It is no coincidence that since we've had the Bayit, our average numbers for events have increased astronomically, to points unimagined in years past. It is truly a blessing... (for)... the students of Halifax... (to)... have a warm and loving new home that welcomes them with open arms."

Western Hillel Student Executive in front of Albert and Temmy Latner Centre

Albert Latner has demonstrated a tremendous level of commitment to Jewish university students across Canada and we are quite confident that the three centres will keep students and the Latner Foundation connected with an unbreakable bond of commitment to Jewish life and Israel.

Keeping Canada's Emerging Leaders
Inspired and Passionate

National Young Leadership TO'05 Conference co-chairs Josh Cooper, Liann Granovsky, Alison Hillel and David Spiro.

The National Young Leadership (NYL) Department of UIA Federations Canada is helping develop leaders for today and tomorrow. The NYL works with a group of already identified young leaders from across Canada, known as the NYL Executive, which is comprised of the Young Adult or Young Leadership chairs and vice-chairs from each community, and is steered by a Management Team. Also on the NYL Executive are the national program, mission and portfolio chairs.

Our community message has resonated with each of these dedicated leaders initially but it is our responsibility to help keep each engaged. NYL coordinates system-wide, enabling our leaders to spend time in different leadership positions.

Current Chair of NYL, David Spiro, for example, has chaired UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Young Adult Division, as well as Co-Chaired its Young Lawyers' Division, prior to joining the NYL Executive Management Team. David's leadership career will continue as he becomes installed as the UJC NYL Co-Chair-Designate in August of this year. We are proud of David's accomplishment in being the first Canadian UJC NYL Co-Chair. There is no doubt that David will continue to answer his community's call.

Similar strides have been made by NYL Vice-Chair, Stephen Gaerber. Stephen helped to establish a Ben Gurion Society chapter in Vancouver, and is very involved on a national level. He is currently Chair of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver's Israel and Overseas Department.

NYL Israel Advocacy Initiative partnership with Canada-Israel Committee ensures that our National missions, Executive Retreats and Leadership Institutes continue to help keep our emerging leaders inspired and passionate. Both Stephen and David continue to be active members of UIA Federations Canada Board of Directors.

RJCO Holocaust Education Program Continues to Expand its Reach

The Regional Jewish Communities of Ontario (RJCO) Holocaust Education program offers workshops to teacher and teacher candidates in university Faculties of Education in Ontario, and is beginning to expand throughout Canada. This program also reaches numerous public schools and Boards of Education across the Province, particularly where Jewish presence is very limited or non-existent.

Speakers and facilitators have had a particularly busy year spreading valuable knowledge as well as effective pedagogical strategies suitable for classroom use. "From northern Ontario's Nipissing and Lakehead universities, to southern Ontario's universities, students have appreciated this unique combination of academic and practical teaching techniques, as well as the opportunity to meet with survivors of the Holocaust," notes Professor Michael Grand, chair of RJCO.

In partnership with Canadian Jewish Congress, a grant of $50,000 US was secured from the Conference on Material Claims Against Germany Inc. to subsidize these workshops on campuses outside Ontario. Recent interest in effective Holocaust education has soared and the program is currently booked well into spring 2007.

I have been lucky to serve as Director General of UIA of Canada in a particularly significant year, as we launch a year of celebrating our 40th Anniversary since the establishment of UIA Canada.

UIAC has grown into one of the most prestigious, significant and renowned institutions in the country. In our 40 years of presence in Israel, the Canadian Federations, represented in Israel by UIAC, have established and supported more than 1,000 programs and built more than 240 physical projects across the country, from Eilat in the south to Metulla in the north.

And as we look back on our achievements with tremendous pride we also look towards to the future, with the knowledge that we will partner with the State of Israel to overcome the challenges it faces. Together, we are trying to create a better Israel that will ensure a better future for the Jewish people wherever we choose to live.

Israel has been the most spectacular Jewish dream in more than two thousand years of Jewish history, and we are all privileged to live in a time when our dream is being fulfilled. UIAC has been the vehicle to fulfill our dream and will continue to do so for many years to come. UIAC is committed to medinat yisrael and am yisrael, together, forever.

Living Bridge Celebrates a

Thousands of Israelis have benefited from Canadian funding throughout the years. Over the past decade, a unique connection has been made between the people of Canada and Israel through the Gesher Chai (Living Bridge) Program, an extension of the Jewish Agency's Project Renewal and Partnership 2000.

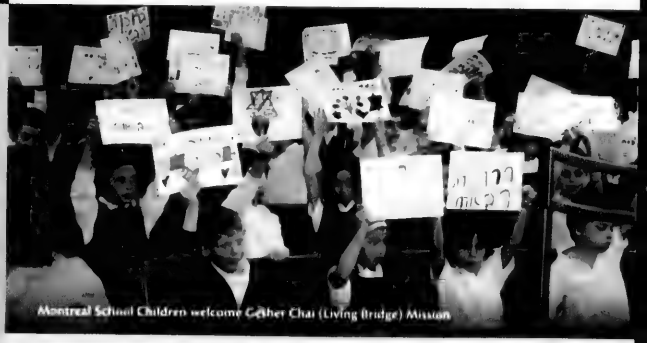
The Gesher Chai program responds to the needs of Israeli society in economically and socially disadvantaged regions such as the Galilee Panhandle, Beer Sheva/B'Nei Shimon and Eilat/Eilot. Professional connections have been formed between educational professionals and Canadian students are in contact with their Israeli peers via e-mail and video-conferences. The Gesher Chai framework has allowed our youngsters to deal with the central and crucial issue of Jewish identity on both cognitive and emotional levels.

Toronto's partnership with Eilat/Eilot, the southern-most region of Israel, has had a powerful effect on the improved quality of education. The Youth Futures program involves personalized intervention, ensuring that each child has the opportunity to successfully complete high school and move into the future as a confident adult. The program is strengthening Israel's civic responsibility, closing social gaps and creating a grassroots volunteer network.

Montreal recently enjoyed the benefits of the Gesher Chai through a reciprocal program in which 17 Israeli students visited their Canadian peers. Four of the Israeli students assisted Bialik High School in the organization of a Yom Hazikaron assembly. "The assembly was among the most powerful and emotionally driven gatherings in years," said one teacher. "Amid restrained tears and heartfelt goodbyes, they have left several people with countless memories and a revived connection with Israel," commented Corey Omer, a graduating student of Bialik.

In Metulla, the northern-most Israeli town, Canada's Coast to Coast communities have helped to reinforce the commitment of local youth toward their own community. Students are asked to volunteer time to help the community, which in turn builds and empowers new leaders for the future. "Our youngsters have become more active in helping out during emergencies and have become real partners and even initiators in the community-at-large", says one teacher.

The Gesher Chai Schools project is now celebrating its 10th birthday. It is truly a special gift and a unique Israel experience for all.



Montreal School Children welcome Gesher Chai (Living Bridge) Mission

"I was part of the Operation Solomon Mission and came with my two siblings, but without my parents. I have worked hard and achieved a lot. The Atidim in Industry Program is helping me to achieve even more."

Benny Ferede was 14 years old when he arrived in Israel with his 28-year-old brother and 13-year-old sister. His parents remain in Ethiopia until today. Suddenly catapulted into a completely different society, he had to learn a new language and new culture.

Benny began his education at a residential school in the north and completed his studies in central Israel. He served in Israel's navy, and upon his discharge, decided to pursue a higher education degree. "I received a Jewish Agency supported Student Authority Scholarship to study photography and web design at the Camera Obscura School of Art in Tel Aviv," says Benny.

In 2005, Benny married Yirus, who recently received her bachelor's degree in biology from Bar Ilan University. The young couple live in Kiryat Ono and have a baby girl.

Benny Ferede

Benny now teaches photography at the Holon Technological Institute (HTI), and is furthering his education with the assistance of the Jewish Agency's Atidim in Industry program. He receives full financial support from Atidim while learning Instructional Systems Technologies.

"Atidim develops what would have been wasted potential of some of the most talented youth in the country, and changes their lives, allowing them to fulfill their potential and contribute fully to Israeli society," says Benny Landa, a leading Israeli businessman involved in the Atidim program.

Atidim in Industry is just one program which will benefit from the Operation Promise Campaign. Operation Promise is initiating vital programs to provide Ethiopian youth and young adults with equal educational opportunities and ensure their full integration into Israeli society.

Loving Kindness for Elderly Jews

in the Former Soviet Union

With no family, Sara now relies on the services of her local Hesed Centre, at which she previously volunteered.

With the collapse of the Former Soviet Union (FSU) and its economy, came a serious deterioration in the health and welfare of its people, especially the aged and disabled. Today, there are fewer Jewish people to care for their elderly than in the general population. Previously, many Jews fled blatant discrimination to pursue careers in under-developed regions, while others emigrated and the weakest were left behind.

The Jewish Federations of Canada are responding to the despair of the elderly Jews through Operation Promise and the establishment of Hesed centres. Hesed (Hebrew for "loving kindness"), a community-oriented program based on volunteerism and Jewish values, uses welfare as a unifying force. Today, thousands of volunteers care for the elderly at many Hesed welfare centres which have been created by the American Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) throughout the FSU. Services include: food packages, meals-on-wheels, social clubs, soup kitchens, heating fuel, medical equipment loans, home care, winter clothing, aid to the visually and hearing impaired and medical consultations.

UIA Federations Canada is committed to making a difference in the lives of the elderly Jews in the FSU through Operation Promise. We are committed, as part of a world-wide effort to raise $30 million to meet the social welfare needs of the underserved elderly. Through Operation Promise we are working to fulfill our legacy and take responsibility for one another's safety, health and quality of life. Operation Promise embodies all our traditions and values of generosity and justice that are the hallmark of the Jewish people.

Where the Funds Go

Regional Jewish Communities of Canada

Campaign 2005

UIA Federations Canada (UIAFC) provides Regional Jewish communities across Canada with the campaign support, community and organizational consultation required to help preserve Jewish life locally and strengthen ties with Israel and world Jewry.

The Regional Jewish Communities of Ontario (RJCO), a department of UIAFC, offers access to Jewish identity programs and services, including community development, youth and adult outreach, Holocaust education and missions to Israel. Highlights of the past year inclded youth Shabbatons, participation in Toronto's Walk for Israel Day, and a group of high students participating in an Israel summer experience. The 2005 UJA Campaign continued to be strong, reaching $640,000.

The Atlantic Jewish Council organized a very successful 2005 UJA Campaign totalling $635,000. Growth in Halifax is evident with the increase of younger families joining community activities. Saskatchewan Regional Council campaigns in both Regina and Saskatoon continued in a tradition of strong community support for local needs and Israel. Saskatoon's commitment to the community is further reinforced by the Jewish Agency's "Young Shlichim" program, which has energized the community to new levels of activity.

Welcoming our new Executive Vice President

Linda Kislowicz will assume the position of Executive Vice President in September of 2006. Linda is a senior experienced professional who brings to this position a strong commitment to community, and Israel and Jewish continuity. She has served in many professional and volunteer capacities throughout her career. We welcome Linda and look forward to working with her.

Dear Friends,

As the end of June approaches, I will complete my term as Executive Vice President. I come to this juncture with mixed feelings. A decision to move on to new opportunities has forced me to reflect on accomplishments and that which remains to be completed...

My personal time line includes seeing the true conjunction of our two predecessor organizations and the evolution of UIAFC, the incredible impact of Taglit birthright Israel, the role we assumed in encouraging the outstanding Israel Emergency Campaign, the reorganization of JIAS, a reassessment of the application of national collective responsibility and the development of CIJA. I believe that I can step away with pride when considering these major achievements as well as the renewed emphasis on the next generation, increased and more defined resources directed towards Israel, improved accountability, growing attention to those who provide major philanthropic support, enhanced relationships with Federations and the development of a strong lay leadership core.

One of the greatest assets of our organization is the outstanding staff. In both Canada and Israel we are blessed with an accomplished, dedicated team who understand the importance of quality service and dedication to our basic values.

I would like to thank Harvey Wolfe who encouraged me to apply for this position. A special thanks to David Goldstein, Yoine Goldstein, Shoel Silver and Stanley Plotnick – the Presidents who led this organization and allowed me to benefit from varied and outstanding styles of lay leadership.

I wish for my successor Linda Kislowisz, as great a professional and personal experience as I have had in Toronto. She is most fortunate to have this opportunity.

In my new position as CEO of the Jewish Agency for Israel, North America (JAFINA), I look forward to continuing to work with my many friends and colleagues in Canada.

Two Israeli soldiers killed, one abducted in raid on IDF base

By DAN BARON
JTA

TEL AVIV — Days away from a planned summit between Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, a deadly clash on the Gaza Strip border has raised the spectre of major escalation.

In their first successful raid out of Gaza since Israel quit the coastal strip last year, Palestinians on Sunday tunnelled under the border fence and stormed an Israeli military position near Kibbutz Kerem Shalom.

Two soldiers, Lt. Hanan Barak, 21, from Arad, and Sgt. Pavel Slutsker, 20, from Dimona, were killed and Cpl. Gilad Shalit, 19, was taken captive. The soldiers returned fire, killing three attackers, and the rest retreated to Gaza.

Shalit, from Mitzpeh Hila in the Galilee, was wounded at the time of his capture and was said to be in stable condition. Palestinian sources said Shalit had stomach and chest wounds.

Armed groups historically have used captured Israeli soldiers as bargaining chips for the release of Palestinian prisoners. However, Olmert ruled out negotiations over Shalit's release.

In a Sunday night meeting, the government's political-security cabinet decided that the army would begin planning a military operation to rescue Shalit, an operation that Olmert was quoted as saying "will last more than a day or two."

Canada pledges to fight terrorism

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Terrorism and radical Islam were jointly condemned at a rally last week addressed by Canadian Minister of Public Safety Stockwell Day and backed in a written message by Prime Minister Stephen Harper, who pledged that Canada is committed "to combating terrorism internationally."

The United Against Terrorism event, initiated by Aish Toronto and Ezer Mizion, was supported by a variety of organizations, ranging from Canadian Jewish Congress and the International Christian Embassy Jerusalem to the Canadian Coptic Association, the Hindu Conference of Canada and the Canadian Lebanese Human Rights Federation.

Featured speakers included the president of the Muslim Canadian Congress, as well as a former U.S. government official, relatives of terrorist victims and the father of a Canadian soldier killed in Afghanistan a few months ago.

Harold Nashman, co-chair of the rally, attended by hundreds of people and held at the cavernous Toronto Centre for the Arts, probably struck the theme of the night when he declared, "Terrorism is very close to home. It knows no borders."

In a brief speech, Day said that Canada will be increasing its counter terrorism co-operation with other countries.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Hospital Gets $25M

TORONTO — Construction and sports magnate Larry Tanenbaum last week gave $25 million to Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital, the largest donation ever for the downtown facility. The money will go to the hospital's Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute to fund annual research awards. Last month, Tanenbaum, chairman of Maple Leaf Sports and Entertainment, gave $50 million to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. His latest gift comes after recent ones by other prominent Jewish philanthropists: Peter Munk's $37-million gift to Toronto General Hospital and Gordon and Leslie Diamond's $20-million gift to Vancouver General Hospital and UBC Hospital Foundation.

Clarification

TORONTO — Barbara Farber has started her term as president-elect of United Israel Appeal Federations Canada and will replace Stanley Plotnick as president next June, when he completes his term. The CJN printed incorrect information on Farber last week.

WORLD

Conviction Nixed

MOSCOW — Russia's Supreme Court has overturned the conviction of a man who attacked shul-goers. The court said the reasoning behind the June 20 ruling will be publicized later. Earlier this year, Alexander Koptsev was sentenced to 13 years in jail for stabbing nine people at a Moscow shul last January. A new trial is expected.

Man Unfit For Trial

MOSCOW — A Russian man who stormed into a shul and tried to attack worshippers in January was found mentally unfit to stand trial. A court in Rostov-on-Don ruled June 9 that Vadim Domnitsky should get psychiatric treatment. He was facing hooliganism charges. Witnesses said he also shouted anti-Semitic threats before he was subdued.

Looted Art Auctioned

NEW YORK — A Holocaust-era looted painting that was recently returned to its heirs was auctioned for $104.1 million (US). The Gustav Klimt painting will now be displayed at the Neue Galerie, a New York gallery owned by Ronald Lauder. The 1907 portrait of Adele Bloch-Bauer was recently returned to Bloch-Bauer's niece, Maria Altmann. Now living in Los Angeles, Altmann, 90, pursued litigation for seven years against Austria to get back the painting, which was first taken from the Bloch-Bauers by Nazis, then taken over by the state. After a 2004 U.S. Supreme Court ruling backing Altmann and subsequent negotiations, the painting was finally returned.

Divestment Repealed

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. — The Presbyterian Church USA has backed away from its 2004 decision to divest from firms that do business in Israel. Meeting at its General Assembly in Birmingham, Ala., the church voted 483-28 to replace a resolution of its last assembly that called for a "phased, selective divestment in multinational corporations operating in Israel." The new policy of "corporate engagement" would restrict investments in Israel, Gaza and West Bank to peaceful pursuits and alters church policy on Israel's security barrier. The 2004 resolution called for the barrier's removal, but the version approved last week asks that the barrier be dismantled where it extends beyond Israel's 1967 borders. The new resolution "puts us back in the place of being an advocate for both" sides, said Rev. Bob Henley of Idaho.

Fighting Missionaries

NEW YORK — Several Jewish groups are launching a campaign to counter one by Jews for Jesus in the New York area. Jews for Judaism is working with the Jewish Community Relations Council of New York, the Jewish Federation of New York and the New York Board of Rabbis to oppose the "grand finale" of the Behold Your God campaign, which has already targeted cities worldwide, including Toronto and Montreal.

Crown Appeals Ruling in Ahenakew Case

REGINA — The Crown last week said it will appeal a recent decision by a Saskatchewan court to overturn native leader David Ahenakew's hate crime conviction.

David Ahenakew

Ahenakew, a former national head of the Assembly of First Nations, was convicted last year of wilfully promoting hatred and fined $1,000 for comments he made to a reporter in 2002, in which he praised Hitler and described Jews as a "disease." The remarks came after he told a native health conference that the Jews started World War II.

In a decision this month, the Saskatchewan Court of Queen's Bench said the trial judge erred in not considering if Ahenakew had wilfully intended to promote hatred. Chief Justice Robert Lang said the reporter approached Ahenakew, who seemed reluctant to get into a discussion about Jews.

Controversial sheik will speak at youth conference

Ul-Haq has said that Jews are the enemies of Islam

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

A controversial British imam who is known to speak out against Jews, Hindus and moderate Muslims is scheduled to address a youth conference in Toronto this week.

Sheik Riyadh ul-Haq, the keynote speaker at the June 30 to July 2 Youth Tarbiyah conference, will educate Muslim youth about Islam and address issues facing Islamic youth in Canada, said Mohammad Alam, president of Islamic Foundation of Toronto, the event organizer.

Immigration Minister Monte Solberg has denied requests made by Canadian faith groups to bar ul-Haq from entering the country, but organizers of a McMaster University seminar as well as a Montreal conference at which ul-Haq was scheduled to speak have decided to cancel the imam's appearances.

The McMaster Muslim Student Association cited a scheduling conflict as the reason, while the organizers of the Montreal conference cancelled his appearance over concerns of negative publicity.

Alam stands behind ul-Haq as a motivational speaker and said he believes the media has painted an unfair picture of him by pulling quotes from a lecture posted on an Islamic website and taking them out of context.

In a speech titled "Jewish Fundamentalism and the Muslims," ul-Haq, formerly the imam at a Birmingham, England, mosque, has been quoted as labelling moderate Muslims as homosexuals "who feel absolutely no shame, or they don't see any sense of irony in the fact that they openly declare that Israel should be recognized as a Jewish state."

Ul-Haq also said that Jews and the chief idolaters, Hindus, are the enemies of Islam.

"Of the whole of mankind you shall find that the most intense in their hatred towards the believers, the most intense in their hatred and enmity towards the believers... the Jews and the mushrikin, the idolaters," ul-Haq said, translating a verse from the Qur'an.

"Of the peoples of the earth, the ones that hate Muslims the most, the ones who are bitterest in their enmity towards Muslims, the most unrelenting, unforgiving, are the Jews and the mushrikin, idolaters in all their forms," he added, paraphrasing from the Qur'an.

The imam also spoke about a Jewish superiority complex that leads Jews to treat members of other faiths differently, and suggested that the State of Israel is based on a foundation of "trigger-happy soldiers" who shoot "little children, girls and boys in the head with live ammunition without any shame, without any loss of moral feeling."

He said Jews monopolize everything, including the Holocaust, God, the media and politics, and prayed that Allah would "give all Muslims... the understanding and the sense to see through their propaganda, their lies and deceit, and to view them as they really are and thus treat them accordingly."

Len Rudner, the national director of community relations at the Canadian Jewish Congress, said that while Alam's claim that the imam's quotes may have been taken out of context is conceivable, in what context, he asked, would those quotes be acceptable?

"[His visit] is a matter of great concern. We work hard to create an environment where people can agree and respectfully disagree in a public forum and his comments are the antithesis of what Canadians have worked for," Rudner said.

"He's saying that the basic tenet of Judaism is to hate Muslims and to be possessed by an innate sense of superiority. If the sheik were to make these comments on Canadian soil, this would constitute as a violation of the Canadian [Criminal] Code and I'm confident that the law enforcement would recognize that," Rudner added.

But Tarek Fatah, the Muslim Canadian Congress communications director, is opposed to giving the sheik even a chance to say something inflammatory and hateful.

"The moment he lands in Canada he should be charged," he said.

Fatah predicted that with the media scrutiny, ul-Haq will make sure to talk about peace, brotherhood and unity, rather than make controversial political statements.

"He says one thing when the mike is on and another thing when the mike is off.

"His speech will be a façade. He'll put on his best British accent to charm the Canadians because Canadians are suckers for British accents," he said with a laugh.

Fatah believes that regardless of his message during the upcoming conference, he should be arrested and charged for spreading hate and should be forced to defend his views in court.

In response to the allegation that the ringleader of the 17-person terrorist group that was recently arrested in Toronto distributed DVDs that glorify terrorism and the 9/11 attacks at a Toronto-area mosque, Rudner said that "there are those who believe this is a new thing and there are those who think it's always been going on.

"But this raises a warning bell in the heads of members of all communities, not just the Jewish community. We all have a responsibility to be aware of what is going on in our own community."

Fatah said "we have not learned anything" from the recent arrest of the Muslims allegedly involved in a terrorist plot.

"It's like we have gone through the whole trauma for nothing," he added.

"I don't know if the 17 young men are guilty, but within the Muslim community, it seems that hate and deep disaffection is spreading."

But Alam said that inviting Muslim scholars like ul-Haq to speak to the youth in Toronto will educate them.

"After what happened, we want to teach youth how to handle situations within the context of our culture," he said.

"We're bringing in scholars to speak about it within the Islamic context."

He said he is not yet certain what the topic of the imam's lecture will be, but insisted that it will have a spiritual rather than a political theme.

Alam added that all Canadians are welcome to attend the lectures and should feel free to ask questions in hopes of gaining a better understanding.

"Canadians should be patient and give him the opportunity to speak, attend the conference and ask questions."

Rudner said that while he is concerned about the imam's Toronto appearance, he has faith in Canadians to be critical.

"We are always concerned when individuals who have a track record of speaking the language of intolerance are given a platform... Our job is to create a society where we are critical thinkers. I have faith in the Canadian society and Canada as a whole. This doesn't stop me from being concerned, but it does stop me from being fearful."

Flying in the upper reaches

From the editor's desk

Last week El Al announced that beginning July 23, it will reduce to five the number of weekly flights that will connect Toronto and Tel Aviv in the summer. That number will decrease even further to three on Sept. 1.

The prohibitive landing fees in Toronto were cited as the main reason for the airline's decision. "Toronto has the highest operating costs of any airport in the world," said Stanley Morais, general manager for El Al in Canada. Given that the airline was recently privatized, the high costs associated with flying in and out of Toronto made the decision more or less inevitable. What a pity.

One of the other consequences of the company's recent privatization is its reinvigorated commitment to high-quality customer service equal to that of the other great international carriers.

This writer can personally attest to that newly enhanced commitment.

Last month, I flew as a guest of the airline in its recently launched platinum class for business travellers. It was a flying experience that soared. True to the airline's name, I truly felt that I was flying in and to the upper reaches.

The luxury begins while settling into one's seat, which is spaciously removed from the seat across the aisle with, it seems to the novice business-class flyer, a virtual boulevard of space in which to stretch one's legs. The stewardesses offer a drink of water or juice while we are still on the ground. After we lift off and the "seat belt" sign has been turned off, they jump up from their seats in the fore cabin to begin their work, which consists primarily of ensuring we are comfortable.

We receive little flight kit-bags of gray plastic and nylon with an EL AL logo pressed into the bag's tweedy pattern. Each bag contains a toothbrush, toothpaste, lip moisturizer, earplugs, eye coverings and socks. We also receive a bottle of water.

A few moments later, one of the stewardesses pushes a mini-bar down the aisle, offering us a pre-meal alcoholic beverage and salty cashews. I chose a suitably platinum single malt scotch. I now feel ready for the long flight ahead.

The adjustment possibilities on the seat are more than I have ever experienced on an airplane flight. I familiarize myself with the electronic controls of the various angles of pitch and recline, which at full extension, approximate a little bed. As I would pleasingly discover over the course of the next half day, this is the single most important difference between economy class and business class – the freedom of movement within the chair and the unencroached sense of personal space beside the chair. Thus, I settle into my "chaise longue" as, inevitably, the scotch begins to settle in me. We then receive little heated hand towels, scented with a minty aroma. They feel warm and soothing against the face.

But, of course, there are other key differences between platinum and economy class. The stewardesses provide dinner, which is served on a heavy, pressed cotton tablecloth with "EL AL Platinum" embossed in gold in the lower right-hand corner.

The menu rivals that of any top-flight restaurant. The appetizer consists of smoked salmon tartar with cucumber and crushed black peppercorns, organic green salad with olive oil and lemon dressing and an assortment of warm rolls and pesto spread. The main course is a choice of either orange-ginger stir-fried chicken, served over jasmine rice with green beans and water chestnuts; or beef bourguignon with pearl onions and button mushrooms and fettuccine noodles and baby carrots; or herb-scented penne pasta served with tomato, olive and caper sauce. Dessert consisted of a selection of cakes and fresh fruit.

I chose the stir-fried chicken. It was served on china. The food was generously portioned and superbly flavoured, nuanced with delicate spicing and presented with obvious attention to esthetics. The smoked salmon tartar, for example, was presented on the plate as an impression of the sun with half-circle cucumbers decorated with spottles of black pepper encircling it like a corrugated aura of sunshine.

The cumulative effect of the ergonomic comfort of the seat, the pleasant buzz of the scotch and the full stomach were like a mother's lullaby to a cradling infant. They soothed me into a deep sleep.

After nearly six hours of slumber, I awoke, but without the crumpled-up and grungy feeling that usually accompanies sleep on an overseas flight. I had slept through two first-run movies, but I felt no sense of regret at having missed them.

Breakfast was then served. It comprised fruit juice, freshly cut fruit, a cheese plate with vegetable crudités and grapes; smoked salmon; yogurt; and a selection of either: an omelette with cheddar cheese, fresh chives, hash brown potatoes and herbed roma tomatoes; or a mushroom quiche; and of course, assorted warm rolls, butter, jam, honey, coffee or tea. I chose the omelette and, again, ate very well and very heartily. After breakfast I dug into my book. Thirty pages later, the captain announced our imminent arrival at Ben-Gurion Airport.

The thoughtful steward staff, fine dining and the restful sleep high above the clouds were a dreamy experience. I was privileged, of course, to have been carried with such doting, careful attention to platinum details all the way from Toronto to Tel Aviv, in the cool blue upper reaches of the sky. – MBD

JEWISH AND ARAB CHILDREN LEARN TOGETHER

Jewish and Arab youngsters in grades four and five play and learn together at the Bible Lands Museum in Jerusalem. They are part of a educational project called The Image of Abraham. The project enables the children to meet, communicate and to overcome negative stereotypes. [Isranet photo]

Terrorists motivated by sheer hatred: Day

Rejecting the proposition that "root causes" such as poverty trigger terrorism, Day said that the 17 Canadian Muslims in southern Ontario who were recently charged with plotting acts of terrorism were not impoverished.

Rather, Day said, terrorists are motivated by "sheer hatred" of different viewpoints.

"If you don't agree with them, they'll kill you. We have to stand up to that."

Defending Canada's current military deployment in Afghanistan and describing it as a peace-making mission, Day said Canadian troops are there to try to stabilize that war-torn nation.

In a veiled reference to Islamic fundamentalism among Muslim Canadians, Day said that "twisted religious notions" must be challenged.

Saying that "the slaughter of innocents" in terror incidents cannot be tolerated, he urged the Muslim community to unequivocally squelch the notion that the "promise of paradise" awaits Muslims who perpetrate terrorism.

Tarek Fatah, founder and president of the secular Muslim Canadian Congress, said Islamic radicals threaten and bully ordinary "nine to five" Muslims.

"Our faith has been hijacked. We will do what we can to take back our religion from these murderers," Fatah said.

John Loftus, a former U.S. justice department prosecutor, claimed that Muslims in Canada are oppressed by "a Wahhabist minority."

The enemy, he said, is not Islam, but radical Islam, "those people who want to kill us."

Loftus said that the typical Al Qaeda recruit in North America is 15 years old, hails from a non-religious background, feels displaced, was subjected to discrimination at school and is computer literate.

As the rally got under way, an Indo-Canadian woman who lost her husband in the 1985 Air India bombing issued a sharp condemnation of terrorism and added, "Let history not repeat itself."

Lynn Goldberg, the mother of an Israeli man killed by terrorists in Jerusalem several years ago, described terrorism as "an ugly, vicious cancer that must be obliterated."

Sarah Phillips, wounded in a 2002 terrorist incident at Los Angeles Airport, called on Canadians to support Canadian combat soldiers in Afghanistan.

She was followed by a man who said that he had been brutally tortured by the Tamil Tigers in Sri Lanka, and he was followed by a woman whose husband died in the Sept. 11, 2001, World Trade Center attack.

She lent her support to a bill pending in the House of Commons that would allow spouses and relatives of terror victims to sue foreign governments.

The father of Matthew Dinning, a Canadian soldier who was killed while on duty in Afghanistan, paid tribute to other Canadian troops who have been killed in action there.

There was also a screening of Obsession, a documentary that draws chilling parallels between Islamic radicalism and Nazism.

Congress says newspaper column was anti-Semitic

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A syndicated newspaper column has been accused of being anti-Semitic in the way it defended a labour union's recent decision to boycott Israel.

Steven Shulman, Ontario regional director and national counsel of Canadian Jewish Congress, said that a column by Toronto-based writer Eric Dowd was anti-Semitic because it "crossed the line from fair comment to defaming the Jewish community."

In a piece carried by regional Ontario newspapers such as the Orangeville Citizen, Pembroke Daily Observer and Midland Free Press in mid-June, Dowd wrote about last month's controversial resolution by the Ontario branch of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) to boycott Israel.

After declaring that CUPE Ontario dared to take on the province's "most influential lobby," Dowd singled out an Ontario cabinet minister for being "in the pocket" of his Jewish constituents.

Lambasting Dowd, Shulman accused him of using his column to focus attention on "Jewish power" in the province. Shulman denounced the allegation as "offensive and untrue."

Dowd also used "untruths" about Israel to support his claim that "inordinate Jewish power in media and politics is the only reason for public criticism" of CUPE's resolution, Shulman said.

"This canard about Jewish power is at odds with the greater good, has been used to provoke anti-Semitism for centuries and is deplorable in the Ontario of 2006," Shulman declared in an e-mail to The CJN.

"Dowd's piece clearly feeds these ugly perceptions," he added.

Congress intends to send a letter to the publishers of the newspapers in which Dowd's column appeared, Shulman said.

"We'll ask how they can allow their newspapers to become a conduit for this kind of message. We hope that this sort of piece will not be published again. It goes beyond fair comment. It's important… to express community concerns."

Shulman said that while Dowd has written "problematic" columns about faith-based courts in Ontario and a visit to Israel by 30 provincial police chiefs last spring, his latest column on CUPE Ontario "crossed the line" and was anti-Semitic and anti-Israel.

In response, Dowd rejected the accusation that his column fostered anti-Semitism.

"It is time to recognize that criticizing Israeli government policies is not anti-Semitic, any more than criticizing policies of the government of Zimbabwe is anti-black, and the public should be aware when any group has power to influence politicians," he said in an e-mail to The CJN.

Accusing Israel of oppressing Arabs, Dowd said Israel "is not only withdrawing extremely slowly from Arab land it seized by force, but indicating it will continue occupying much of it."

He added, "Israel has brought in millions of Jews from other countries to settle on this land."

Dowd, who declined to be interviewed about his allegations, said Shulman has not produced facts to show that his piece is inaccurate, "but expresses opinions that the column was reprehensible."

Dowd continued:"One indication of the Israeli lobby's influence is many Ontario residents have shown they disagree with Israeli policies over the years, but this has not been reflected in the stands taken by politicians. I know from my talks with them they fear losing the votes of Jews, who are public-spirited and vote, and to many of whom commitment to Israel is their deepest passion."

In his column on CUPE, Dowd opened with this paragraph: "A labour union has dared take on Ontario's most influential lobby and its unfailing ally, government."

Defending CUPE's position, Dowd wrote, "Israel has kept saying it wants separation [from the Palestinians], but indicated it is unwilling to give up anything like all the land it seized, continued building new homes on it for Jews, tightened its grip by building a wall around much of it and dropped many hints it may set boundaries unilaterally."

He added: "Israel also refuses to negotiate with the Hamas party Palestinians chose recently to represent them them on the stronger ground it has called for the destruction of the state of Israel and approved suicide bombings."

Dowd went on to say that the "pro-Israel lobby" is successful because "hundreds of MPPs" from all parties have expressed solidarity with Israel, "knowing the value of Jewish votes, which are crucial in some ridings."

Elaborating on this theme, Dowd said that "pro-Israel lobbies also dominate editorial opinion and letters in three out of four major Toronto newspapers. Now CUPE has incurred the full wrath of Jews and their supporters."

Turning to Israel's conflict with the Arabs, Dowd commented, "Israel had only 700,000 Jewish residents in 1948, but now has five million, who speak in New York, London and Russian accents and must have taken land from Arabs."

In a reference to the 1946 bombing of the King David Hotel in Jerusalem, Dowd wrote: "Israel claims it cannot negotiate with Hamas because it is terrorist, but Menachem Begin [a former Israeli prime minister] led a group which blew up a hotel, killing 91 Britons, Arabs and Jews.

"Yitzhak Shamir [another former Israeli prime minister] was prominent in another [incident] which murdered the United Nations' mediator. Yitzhak Rabin [Israel's two-time prime minister] was high-ranking in a third [incident] which slaughtered British peacekeepers and left their bodies hanging in trees."

After writing that Ontario Immigration Minister Mike Colle urged CUPE to withdraw its resolution, Dowd observed, "Colle has many Jewish voters in his riding and is very much in their pocket. He told one of their rallies that Israeli Jews suffer terribly from Arab suicide bombers, but expressed no sympathy for Arabs."

Shulman said that he has not been in contact with Dowd.

"We haven't spoken to Dowd. This is not a discussion to have with him. The newspapers are responsible. We're in the process of sending a letter to the publishers."

Several of the newspapers that published Dowd's column are members of the Ontario Press Council, said Shulman.

Dowd, 75, has been in the newspaper business since the age of 15. He was formerly a staff reporter at the Globe and Mail.

Israeli childhood cancer organization opens Canadian office in Toronto

By JENNA ROSMAN
CJN Intern

A non-profit organization whose goal is to improve the quality of life for Israeli children with cancer opened a Canadian office recently.

Through its office in Toronto, Larger Than Life has begun fundraising here. Shortly, some Jewish day schools will sell such items as multi-coloured "flower" highlighters, cellphone necklace bands and key chains at book fairs, in support of the organization.

"It's children for children, that's the idea behind it," said Anat Strauss, managing director of Larger Than Life Canada Association.

"We're going to have a Purim celebration, we're going to have a Chanukah celebration, we're going to have a talent show, we're going to have an auction – things like that."

The local initiatives have involved students of the Associated Hebrew Schools, said Strauss.

Earlier this month, the students hosted a talent show at the North York Public Library, and donated all the proceeds to Larger Than Life. On June 15 at the Leah Polsuns Theatre, a performance and a movie about Larger Than Life raised funds for the Canadian association.

Established five years ago by Zion Abitboul, whose son was diagnosed with cancer as an infant, Larger Than Life is the sole organization in Israel dedicated to helping children, from birth until age 18, cope with the disease.

In addition to Toronto, Larger Than Life also has chapters in England as well as in the United States.

The organization schedules various trips for the children to such places as Orlando, Fla.; England and France; the U.S. West Coast and Eilat, Israel. There is also a five-day summer camp for 100 children in northern Israel.

"The trips are important because it gives them a better quality of life," Strauss said. "It gives them the energy to continue with the treatments."

Families receive support through "relaxation vacations" in Eilat and on the Purim Smile Train, which takes 1,200 children with cancer and their families by train from Haifa to Be'er Sheva with a host of various entertainers including clowns and performers. "Fun Days" for the mothers of children with cancer, allow them to "take some time off from their tough routine and re-energize for the next round of challenges" according to official material.

"A lot of the time, when a child gets sick in Israel, it affects the entire family, and they may not have the right support or [know] how to go about [accessing] their treatment," said Yona Soer, president of Larger Than Life Canada. She said families will be provided "anything they need" by means of support.

The association has seven employees, and is run almost exclusively by volunteers.

Strauss said support comes from "lots of Israeli brands," including Coca-Cola of Israel and Bisli.

In 2005, fundraising efforts allowed the Sheba Medical Center at Tel HaShomer Hospital, outside Tel Aviv, to undergo extensive renovation of its oncology department as well as the respective waiting rooms.

On Dec. 17, Larger Than Life Canada hosts a Chanukah gala for parents and children, with a variety of entertainment. All proceeds from the event will go to the oncology department at Rambam Hospital in Haifa, Israel.

New thinking (2)

Last week in this space, we directed a plea to the lay and professional leaders of our community federations to "look for new solutions, new ideas, new approaches and innovative thinking to thwart the insidious peril of out-of-reach" Jewish school tuitions.

No issue is more important for the long-term well-being and vibrancy of the Jewish community than stemming and reversing the soaring cost of Jewish education.

The Jewish people – at home and abroad – are at a crossroads.

In its most recent annual assessment of the condition of world Jewry, the experts at the Jewish People Policy Planning Institute (JPPPI) poignantly describe the possibilities that lie ahead.

"Present realities and dynamics of the Jewish people and of the environments influencing it move in part in the direction of thriving and in part in the direction of decline… Present propensities as a whole definitively do not assure a thriving future for the Jewish people [our emphasis]. Therefore, 'interventions with historic processes'… are imperative, both on the level of overall Jewish People policies and on the level of each of the main Jewish communities… To do so successfully, at least some radically innovative long-term grand policies are imperative, as well as a more focused will, much larger resources and revamped institutions."

Community leaders must intervene to make Jewish education affordable to the large majority of Jewish families who are in the middle and lower rung of the economic ladder.

It is undeniably true that the lack of intense, formal Jewish education does not doom an individual to Jewish illiteracy in adult life. Nor does it follow inevitably that "Jewishly unschooled" means Jewishly unidentified or unaffiliated. But it is equally true that the best guarantor of Jewish literacy in adult life is Jewish education. And the best way of increasing the chances that an individual will meaningfully align himself or herself with the Jewish people – irrespective of subsequent life choices concerning Jewish ritual observance or communal, cultural and other Jewish expression – is Jewish education.

In the language of the JPPPI, our leaders must find "radically innovative, long-term grand-policies" concerning Jewish school tuitions. They must find ways of reducing the costs to the schools of providing their services, so that the tuitions will be commensurately reduced or capped. This must not, however, be achieved by reducing salaries and benefits paid to teachers and other school staff. For they are the front-line crafters of the education that must be reinforced each day in our homes and other institutions. Rather, federations must find ways to channel funds directly to schools to significantly defray their ongoing operational costs without impinging on their operational independence.

The new, shining buildings and expanded houses of Jewish life today will be faded and little-used tomorrow – monuments to a once fuller, more engaged Jewish past – unless we act immediately to ensure that formal, classroom Jewish education will not be beyond the reach of the large core of Jewish families that comprise our community.

CJC's advocacy

Thank you Gerald Gall for reminding us of the vital work undertaken on our behalf by Canadian Jewish Congress ("CJC must return to its advocacy roots," CJN, June 22). I firmly believe that the professionals and, as importantly, the volunteer leadership of Congress are unsung heroes.

Volunteer leadership who engage in advocacy are the very soul of ethical Judaism. Gall's column shows us clearly that this is as true today as it was in years past.

I, for one, was proud to read that the current CJC President, Ed Morgan, was the first Jewish leader ever to address the Council of the Assembly of First Nations. And if memory serves me correctly, Morgan also led a group of aboriginal chiefs to Israel, which was, from what I can see, another first.

Morgan epitomizes a long line of intelligent, dignified and respected Jewish volunteer leadership. I certainly second Gall's appeal to our community for CJC to be provided the proper resources so that volunteers such as Morgan can continue to represent our community on today's critical issues facing our community.

Caroline Konecny
Whitby, Ont.

* * *

Gerald Gall's article focusing on CJC advocacy rekindled some old memories and sparked some thoughts for the future.

CJC has been blessed with many fine leaders. During my generation alone I have seen Irving Abella, Moshe Ronen, Keith Landy and the current president, Ed Morgan, represent our community with great dignity.

As we continue to move forward I hope others in our community will grab the torch and continue in this fine spirit of volunteerism.

Day schools need endowment campaign

The CJN rightly warns about the devastating implications for Jewish continuity if our community fails to resolve the current accessibility crisis in Jewish day schools ("New thinking needed," editorial, CJN, June 22).

Unfortunately, the only suggested solution was to reduce the school's operating costs. Operating costs, comprised mainly of teacher salaries, cannot be substantially reduced without significantly reducing teacher salaries or increasing class sizes, neither of which seems appropriate.

Two other solutions cry out for leadership.

First, as The CJN alluded to, in Ontario, the lack of public funding for Jewish schools is inexcusable, since Catholic schools are fully funded. Our community organizations need to effectively deliver the message that official religious discrimination against non-Catholic minorities, in open violation of binding international human rights law, will no longer be treated as business as usual.

Meanwhile, a massive endowment campaign is needed to help lower the tuition barrier that currently shuts out thousands of our children from Jewish day school educations. Every member of our community should be expected to will five per cent of his or her estate on death to Jewish education, and our schools and synagogues should not accept families who do not pledge to participate.

Faith-based schools should work together

Gila Martow is saying and doing the right thing to encourage the provincial government to change its ridiculously outdated 1867 exclusionary legislation on school funding ("Associated mom grills MPP on school funding," CJN, June 15). I also appreciate Liberal MPP Mario Racco's simple gesture of support in making an appearance in front of the local press at a faith-based school. It appears that he has taken up a position against his party's wishes. Courage and vision like Racco's is well appreciated and noted.

Non-Catholic religious communities need to follow Martow's path and further organize in an even bigger and better way – as ridings rather than as ethnic or religious communities. Ultimately, the task is to embarrass or shame the current government to include the miscellaneous religious communities and their faith-based schools in the separate school boards.

'Zionist movement must renew and strengthen': Olmert

Excerpts from the speech Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert made to the 35th Zionist Congress in Jerusalem on June 20, 2006.

The fundamental issues on the table at the Congress are, as always: first, ensuring the future of Jewish existence overseas, through Zionist activity, encouraging aliyah, providing Jewish and Zionist education to the young generation, and deepening the identity, solidarity with and affinity to Israel.

Second, assistance to Jews in distress and waging war against anti-Semitism anywhere in the world.

And finally, unification of the Jewish people with the State of Israel, and providing moral and political support to Israel's struggle for security and peace.

For these goals, the Zionist movement must renew and strengthen, co-operate and gather together under its wing more and more Jewish communities, frameworks, institutions and organizations, and find additional means of mobilizing resources to expand its activities.

It is our duty to prevent any danger of losing a Jewish majority or creating an inseparable bi-national reality in the Land of Israel. We aspire to reach a peace agreement with our Palestinian neighbours, based on division of the land and "two countries for two peoples."

Division of the land is not our heart's desire; it is simply a reality. As one who carries the supreme responsibility for the State of Israel, I see reality as it is, with my eyes wide open.

The demographic balance between Jews and Arabs in the Land of Israel is not static. Time is not neutral in this case – it is acting against us.

If we wish to ensure the existence and future of a Jewish and democratic Israel, we must act now, in the next few years, and shape the permanent borders of the State of Israel. I intend to seriously and thoroughly examine whether there is a possibility of doing so through negotiation and agreement with the Palestinians, since this possibility is preferable under all circumstances.

Ehud Olmert speaking to the congress

However, I do not intend to wait forever. Under no circumstances is ongoing deadlock an option. I have absolutely no doubt that the majority of citizens of Israel will give me their support.

In the meantime, we will of course continue our fight against terror. Terrorist organizations gain inspiration from fundamentalist, anti-Semitic and murderous ideologies, which call for the blood of all Jews and Israelis.

The heads of terror, who cry for our destruction after every unfortunate accidental and unintended injury to innocents due to IDF [Israel Defence Forces] fire, are the ones who will send murderers to blow up buses full of passengers, families innocently dining, teenagers at entertainment venues, and women and children at busy shopping centres.

They are the ones shooting, in these very days, at civilian population in the south of the country, in cities like Sderot and in villages and kibbutzim such as Yad-Mordechai and Nahal Oz and Kfar Aza and other communities.

From here I say to those who are trying to hurt [our citizens] – we will take harsh measures, more harsh and more painful than the ones taken before. We will reach every place, we will reach every one, there will be no immunity to anyone involved in terrorism, regardless of what they do or who they belong to. We will not relent in this war and we will defeat terrorism and bring security to all the parts of the State of Israel, in the south of the country and in other areas.

Despite the fact that the terrorists act in and fire from densely populated areas, the IDF is mostly successful in isolating the murderers, and targeting them and them only. Under these fighting conditions, unfortunately, sometimes innocent citizens are injured, despite all the efforts to avoid it. However, we must remember that the fight against terror was forced on us.

The Palestinian Authority never upheld their commitment to stop terror attacks and dismantle terrorist organizations. When it happens, there will, of course, be no need to continue fighting. Regrettably, I do not see this happening in the near future.

The terrorist organizations would not be able to continue to act if they did not receive encouragement, funding, training and guidance from regimes and organizations which support terror on the axis of evil which runs through Tehran, Damascus, Al Qaeda, global jihad and Hezbollah.

The shameful statements made by the president of Iran were heard by the entire world, and it is inconceivable that such a fanatical dictatorial regime will have the weapons to realize his insane visions.

We must not forget the lessons of history. We, the Jews, certainly cannot forget.

Zionist Congress: youth must be served

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

On a sun-drenched window ledge, three young European delegates to the Zionist World Congress sit poring over resolutions on anti-Semitism and Zionist education, debating which ones to oppose and which to support.

Dana Landau, 21, from Zurich, and Jeremy Uhr, 25, and Ilan Tojerow, 29, both from Brussels, are among the younger generation of faces at the Congress. Committed and intelligent, they wonder, like many of their fellow delegates, how to keep the World Zionist Organization relevant and results oriented in the 21st century.

"The Zionist movement is living in the past," said David Borowich, chairman and founder of Dor Chadash, a New York-based group that seeks to build ties among young Israelis and American Jews. "What are we revitalizing? What is the Zionist movement?"

A vote at the last Congress four years ago decided that future gatherings would set aside 25 per cent of seats for delegates age 30 or under.

At a plenary session held at Jerusalem's International Convention Center, many delegates spoke in favour of giving the younger generation more clout.

"We stand here and we talk about renewal and pay lip service to you. We have 25 per cent of the delegates, but the decisions are made at the [Zionist] executive, and there is no voice there for youth," said a young delegate from Canada, Tomer Sadetsky. "We have to find a way to make us involved in the real decisions."

Sadetsky was echoing frustration shared by other delegates about how decisions and policy are set in the organization. Many grumble over what they describe as a bloated bureaucracy with little accountability.

"It will be passé if it keeps being business as usual. The only way to make it real and meaningful for those who do not come to the Congress is to have a more democratic and open process," said Michael Cohen, co-founder of the Green Zionist Alliance.

About 2,000 delegates and observers gathered in Jerusalem for the 35th Congress, from June 19 to 22. The first Congress – held in 1897 in Basel, Switzerland – launched the modern Zionist movement.

The organization's original goal was to establish a Jewish homeland. In recent years, its main functions have been providing roughly half of the decision-making power for the Jewish Agency for Israel, which controls a $350-million budget. Half of the Agency's board of governors are from the organization, as are many of its committee members.

The presence of the Zionist movement's charismatic founder, Theodor Herzl, loomed large at this year's Congress – on posters and large screens.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert addressed the group, speaking of the gap between Herzl's dream and the modern State of Israel.

In Altneuland, the book in which Herzl imagined an idealized homeland for the Jews, "Herzl envisioned a utopian state. The State of Israel is not one, because in our world there is no utopian reality," Olmert said. "In many ways, the State of Israel has exceeded Herzl's vision. In other ways, it is still remote."

This Congress continued the marked growth of delegates from the religious streams. Factions aligned with the traditional Zionist parties used to be dominant.

Rabbi Richard Hirsch, former executive director of the World Union for Progressive Judaism and a member of the Jewish Agency's board of governors, said it was only natural that Diaspora Jews align themselves with what they feel connected to – their religious streams.

"People in the Diaspora have no relationship to the political parties in Israel, especially when those political parties are always breaking up and changing," he said.

Rabbi Hirsch, who once held a senior position in the World Zionist Organization (WZO), said the organization was "badly in need of repair."

Judy Yudof, president of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, was representing the Conservative movement, which had one of the largest delegations. Despite her movement's success in WZO elections, she said apathy about the movement was a major problem.

"It's very hard to get the Jews in the Diaspora to understand what the Congress is all about and what the WZO is all about," she said.

What got votes out was the idea that the more seats the Conservative movement's Zionist wing would win, the more money would be allocated for programs in Israel that the movement supports.

"The money in the end is what this thing is all about," she said.

In the busy lobby of the convention center, Jews from around the world mingled – long-haired, teenaged youth, movement members from Argentina, retired delegates from the United States and Australian activists.

Taking in the scene was Avrom Krengell, a lawyer from Johannesburg who heads the South African Zionist Federation.

"For us, there is symbolic value is seeing 2,000 Jews come together and renew their commitment to Zionism, Israel and the Diaspora," he said.

For those from South Africa and other countries where anti-Israel sentiment has been high in recent years, the Congress can be a place to draw strength.

"In the Diaspora, where there is a feeling of detachment and isolation," he said, "this is a place that can give strength to our participants."

But for the young European delegates, the future of Zionism in their countries is not clear. The three that sat in the window reviewing resolutions point out one that they hope will pass: it calls for Israeli envoys to work with youth movements abroad. In recent years, they said, hardly any emissaries have been sent and funded by the WZO.

The Pope at Auschwitz

Anti-Semitism is a disease that all Jews must fight tooth and nail. Though its effect is a calamity for us all, for secular Jews, the struggle against it is also something of a surrogate religion. Even when they repudiate the traditional Jewish notion of a covenant between God and the people of Israel, which is the foundation of Judaism, they are nevertheless likely to declare their solidarity with the people and its ways. Its suffering in the past, especially in the Holocaust, and the dangers it still faces today fires their Jewish commitments. Justifiably, they see the State of Israel as evidence that what happened then will not happen again.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

Religious Jews also fight anti-Semitism, often exposing themselves to it more than others because of dress and demeanour, but they don't see it as a primary component of their Judaism. Their commitment rests on the covenant between God and Israel at Sinai, however they may interpret it. Anti-Semitism is the price Jews have had to pay because of their faithfulness to God, and religious Jews contend that the most effective way to fight our enemies is by remaining true to God's commandments.

The difference between the secular and the religious views may help us understand the opposing reactions of Jewish leaders to the statement Pope Benedict XVI made during his recent visit to Auschwitz. Secularists criticized the Pope for not speaking out explicitly against anti-Semitism. Religionists praised him because he distanced himself from supersessionism.

Supersessionism is the traditional Christian doctrine that teaches that God has cancelled his covenant with the Jews and replaced it with the "new" covenant (testament) with the church. In this Christian theological scheme of things, Judaism was rendered obsolete and Jews were perceived as irrelevant relics. They were not to be exterminated, only humiliated.

The history of Christian-Jewish relations must be understood in this light, as must Christian anti-Semitism. By distancing himself from supersessionism and affirming that the Jewish people have remained living witnesses to God, the Pope went to the root of the problem. He embraced the notion of a dual covenant, one with the Jews and one with the church, which by implication eliminates Christian rejection of the Jewish people.

Jewish-Christian relations now become symmetrical, to be conducted without malice or prejudice, and in mutual respect. Theologically trained and religiously sensitive Jews understand this Pope, who is first and foremost a theologian, and they praise him for his stance. Implicit in the Pope's rejection of supersessionism is the contention that anti-Semitism has also been a Christian problem. Speaking at Auschwitz, the epitome of Jew-hatred, he offered a clear message to his adherents. I hope they understood him better than his Jewish critics seem to have done.

Choices, decisions, uncertainty and risk

In life, people are often confronted by sudden surprises and unexpected ups and downs. For me, the 2005-2006 school year, and the weeks since, have been filled with important decisions to be made and unexpected news that has forced me to deal with things using the same approach taken by my bubbie, who calls life "the great big I don't know."

Matthew Pottens in Halifax

In other words, when you are hit with yet another of life's uncertainties, instead of shying away from it because you "don't know" much about it, make the most of the situation.

Writing for the Canadian Jewish News has proven to be a positive and beneficial experience. I've further developed my writing skills and gained some needed experience in the "real world," and I believe that I've connected with many readers out there, young and old, on issues that I feel have been worth discussing.

I realize that my beloved readers may not be able to make a connection with all of my articles, such as the ones about living with mice, online instant messaging, canoe tripping, immigrating to Canada, and being a new student in Halifax.

But come on! How many immigrant mice are you aware of that are computer literate, enjoy the odd canoe trip, and are planning on coming to Dalhousie University any time soon?

See, my job is harder than it looks.

I initially became involved with The CJN with the intention of getting some journalistic experience. But after three years of school, several part-time jobs, and the notion that journalism was my only career option, I have begun to have second thoughts about my career path.

What direction do I head in now? There are plenty of options, and I have started to realize the importance of keeping those options open. I will finish my bachelor's degree next year, and after that, I will need to make more important decisions.

This summer, I will be attending Camp Winnebagoe for the first time – another "great big I don't know." Last summer, I went to a camp in upstate New York, knowing nobody, but I entered the summer with a positive attitude and expecting a great time, and that's exactly what I got.

It's 2006, another summer and another camp, and I truly can't wait. I would encourage kids, if they get the opportunity, to try something completely out of the ordinary one summer, and don't be afraid to take a chance once in a while. My decision to go on Outward Bound in 2002 came from not having anything else to do. I didn't even like canoe tripping at the time, but I came back with a new passion for the outdoors, and I am tremendously proud of my physical and mental accomplishments on that 21-day canoe trip. That adventure changed me and greatly contributed to my becoming the man who is writing this column for you today.

As for next year, more uncertainties struck me and my roommates when we found out that two of our other roommates, whom we love dearly, will not be attending school in Halifax next year.

Jason Freedman got into architecture school at Carleton University in Ottawa, and Josh Kaminsky got into the Ivey business program at the University of Western Ontario. Mazel tov boychiks!

But the rest of us needed to find two new roommates. The good news is that we did, and they are great guys. But the sudden news that two good friends of mine will no longer be in Halifax gave me pause, and it made me realize that there are more than just three houses to hang out in here in Halifax, and that our small group of Jewish friends from Toronto doesn't need to be our only group of friends.

Anyway, I hope you've enjoyed my monthly column, and maybe even learned a few things from it. This is my final submission, and I want to thank you all very much for taking the time to read these pieces. If you have any questions or comments, feel free to e-mail me at mpottens@dal.ca.

Have an amazing summer, and take care of yourselves.

More than just a restaurant is closing

Blaise Pascal, the French mathematician and philosopher, once said: "Our achievements of today are but the sum total of our thoughts of yesterday. You are today where the thoughts of yesterday have brought you and you will be tomorrow where the thoughts of today take you."

Gershon Richter in Winnipeg

Recently, a forum organized by the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg tried to figure out which services are required for a "vibrant Jewish community." Since, as the federation noted, one of the "major sources of our identity is religion," the importance of "available and affordable kosher food under highly inclusive, well accepted authority" was emphasized.

I just found out that at the end of July, an essential Winnipeg Jewish institution will close its doors for the last time. Bathurst Street Market, Winnipeg's only strictly kosher store and restaurant, has decided to close due to lack of business. The family-owned store and restaurant will have been open three days short of 13 years.

I want to make clear that I am not criticizing the federation, an organization whose social justice and outreach programs I fully support. The criticism for the state of our community belongs not to organizations but to individuals. Every community has its charitable organizations, such as the federation, that organize projects too large for individuals to put together on their own. Such organizations depend on the generosity and willingness of the people in the community to continue their charitable and social work. The organizations are not the problem.

The problem is that our reality does not agree with what we say are our priorities as a Jewish community.

This discrepancy brings up fundamental questions of what we as Jews represent and what we embody. Simply by being Jewish, we represent ideas present in Jewish religion and history. As a community, we want show off our unique culture, our connection to the past and to Israel (Israel being the second "major source of our identity," according to the federation). We bring in Israeli musicians, we eat falafel on Yom Ha'atzmaut, we go to synagogue on the High Holy Days, and we donate money to the Jewish National Fund.

Yet all this is superficial. These values are symbolic rather than embodied. We are none of the things that we wish to show ourselves to be.

The Irish playwright Oliver Goldsmith once said: "You can preach a better sermon with your life than with your lips." So, how have we been living?

By and large, we do not keep kosher. In 2001, there were more than 12,000 people in Winnipeg who identified themselves as Jewish by religion, yet many synagogues have difficulty getting 10 people together for a service, many young people are leaving, and the city's only kosher food store is closing.

There is an obvious flaw in the plan. All these community-driven events are just that: events. They are supposed to serve as an example of what everyday life can be. Instead, they remain isolated from our lives. They have no importance outside of the time they take up and the diversion they represent. Instead, we have a decline in the services required for Jewish life.

My father is fond of telling me how the Jewish religion has sustained us and kept Jews distinct for thousands of years. We have been persecuted for our Jewish identity, we have been killed and dispersed and we have suffered, yet the Jewish religion, and we along with it, survived. We have maintained our identity throughout history.

Are the things we do now enough to maintain that identity? Is the external connection we feel to Israel enough to replace the internal connection that Jews have felt to Judaism?

In his book To Kindle a Soul, Lawrence Kelemen said: "In the facades we put on for others we demonstrate our potential; through our children, we reveal our reality."

If our children are the true indication of the life we lead, what do they say about our community and the values we teach?

Well, intermarriage has never been higher, everyone loves falafel, and the Bathurst Street Market is closing.

The Kirshner File

'I don't want to eat hummus in Damascus'

For three decades, Amnon Sharon kept his harrowing ordeal to himself, never considering the possibility of setting it down on paper. Sharon, an Israeli tank commander, was captured on the first day of the Yom Kippur War – which broke out on Oct. 6, 1973 – and spent the next eight months in captivity in Syrian prisons, the victim of unremitting torture. To this day, he still bears the physical and psychological marks of his incarceration, five months of which was in solitary confinement.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

"I wanted to write about it," he said the other day in an interview, "but it was difficult. I tried and tried, but couldn't."

But three years ago, at a soldiers' reunion to mark the 30th anniversary of the war, the men he had served with convinced him to tell his story to the public. "That was the trigger that gave me the power to write," explained Sharon. "I wanted to get it off my shoulders and commemorate the memory of comrades who had fallen in the war."

Last October, the Hebrew-language edition of his memoir, Sane in Damascus (Gefen), was published. It has since gone through two printings, been praised by the former minister of education and used by the Israeli armed forces as a kind of manual. The English version, translated by Jessica Setbon, came out recently.

Sharon, who was here to publicize his book and plug the activities of Bet Halochem, an Israeli organization that assists disabled war vets, said that Sane in Damascus is a primer about positive thinking, mental resiliency and, ultimately, sheer survival.

To the best of his knowledge, it's the first and only book-length account, in any language, of the trials and tribulations of an Israeli prisoner of war in Syria, Israel's bitter enemy and adversary in four wars – 1948, 1967, 1973 and 1982.

Born in 1947 in a British detention camp in Cyprus, and the son of Hungarian Holocaust survivors, Sharon said that he rarely succumbed to despair and hopelessness as he was beaten and tortured. "A few times, I wanted to die," he admitted, "but then I told myself, be strong."

Sharon, unlike Israeli pilots who had been given special training to face the prospect of torture, was forced to develop his own survival techniques. He sharpened his mind by doing math problems and recalling dates and events, and he strengthened his body by exercising. Above all, he never lost his faith in God, though he does not consider himself religious, and never stopped believing that he would be released and be reunited with his wife, Bella, and their children in Tel Aviv.

Amnon Sharon today

Throughout his interminable confinement, Sharon was buoyed by dreams that, in retrospect, were remarkably prescient.

He dreamed that he would regain his freedom on June 8, 1974, and, in fact, he returned to Israel on June 6 of that year. He dreamed that he would be a senior army commander, and indeed, he was promoted to the rank of colonel and eventually placed in charge of testing the new Merkavah tank. He dreamed that he would leave his job as a publisher of commercial directories and become the owner of a bed and mattress factory, and that is what happened when he built such a plant on a kibbutz in central Israel.

Now a grandfather, Sharon was the commander of a tank platoon in the 7th Brigade during the Six Day War in Sinai. Like many Israelis who were certain that the Arabs would never dare attack Israel after their ignominious defeat in the Six Day War, he was dumbfounded by the outbreak of the Yom Kippur War, which erupted when Syria attacked Israeli forces on the Golan Heights and Egypt crossed the Suez Canal and captured the bunkers and fortifications of the Bar-Lev Line.

Although Israel defended its positions on the Golan with a far smaller force than Syria fielded on the first day of hostilities, Sharon was fully confident that Israel would easily prevail. "We were the tankers who had known victory in the Six Day War, and we lived with the feeling that no one could beat us."

But as he headed into battle in his Centurion near Nafah, his tank was hit and burst into flames, killing his crew. Syrian commandos had ambushed them.

Before he knew it, Sharon found himself surrounded by Syrian troops aiming their Kalashnikov rifles at him. They hoisted him off the ground, dragged him to a tank and threw him on the turret like a sack of potatoes.

In an act of kindness, a young Syrian officer offered Sharon – a captain – water. At a medical station in the field to which he was subsequently transferred, a second Syrian officer slammed Sharon with the butt of his rifle and sprayed bullets at his feet. Syrian tankers protected Sharon from any further harm, but then he was bullied by yet another Syrian soldier. After Sharon was taken into Syria, border guards hit him on the head and shoved him in the shoulder with an iron rod.

Once in Damascus, Sharon was briefly questioned by two men in civilian suits, one of whom spoke virtually flawless Hebrew.

But after they left, he was kicked, punched and whipped by his jailers in a painful, humiliating and endless ritual, and left almost naked in his claustrophobic cell. At one point, a soldier stuck a knife in his back, and a medic was called to tend to his wound.

Two weeks later, he was transported to Al-Mazeh, a military prison in Damascus, and subjected to more violence. After one particularly severe beating, the pain was so intense that he felt his body and soul separate into two distinct entities.

"Slowly, the tortures became routine," Sharon writes, "and my daily schedule was regular. Three times a day, the guard would throw me [a] black sack to put over my head, then lead me down a corridor to the latrine. There was no toilet or toilet paper, just a hole in the cement floor and beside it a short rubber hose attached to a faucet, like an improvised bidet."

Meals were served three times a day, but were austere. Worms crawled in his tea.

The interrogations were ceaseless: what kind of missiles did Israel deploy? What is the Merkavah tank? Where are army bases, electricity plants and gas storage facilities? Since Sharon did not usually know the answers, he was relentlessly beaten.

Once, an interrogator addressed him in a calm, polite tone in Hebrew. "Look, Amnon, I only want what's good for you. It's worth it for you to co-operate with us. In the end, we'll give you a new wife, a house in a village somewhere in Syria and a donkey, and you'll have a good life."

Always, his captors tried to break his spirit by bombarding him with brazen lies.

Shortly after his arrival in Damascus, he was told that Israel had gone down to military defeat in the war. "It was like a bomb in my face," said Sharon.

Then he was informed that his beloved mother, Esther, had died.

Conditions improved when he started sharing a larger cell with 20 of his fellow captives (mainly pilots and navigators), getting access to better food and being allowed regular Red Cross visits.

Amnon Sharon in 1973

Three months before being set free, he and his fellow inmates received packages from Israel crammed with books, games, toothpaste, toothbrushes, battery-operated shavers and Passover supplies.

"That Passover in an enemy prison took on special significance," he writes. "We were prisoners just as our forefathers had been, except instead of Egypt, we were in Syria. Just as they had hoped and prayed to go out from slavery into freedom, so did we."

He was also permitted to step outside in the sunshine. For six months, he had seen neither sky nor sun.

Around this period, he and his fellow inmates were examined by Syrian doctors, prompting them to speculate that their days as prisoners were numbered.

When they were finally released, they boarded a Red Cross plane bound for Tel Aviv. When Sharon landed at Ben-Gurion Airport, his wife and his parents were the first to race toward him from the crowd.

At home, he was treated to a moving reception by his neighbours. But much to his disgust, a Knesset member told him that Israel had paid too heavy a price for their release.

Sharon retired from the army in 1988 after participating in the Lebanon war and commanding a battalion in Sinai.

Today, he still licks his wounds. The soles of his feet invariably hurt. His fingers have lost their feeling. He suffers from post-traumatic stress. Any sudden noise startles him. He cannot sleep soundly.

Yet his spirit is stronger, he fears nothing and, to him, there is no such thing as an insurmountable problem.

He does not hate the Syrians, but wants nothing to do with them, even if, in the unlikely event, Israel and Syria make peace.

"I don't want to deal with them," he said flatly with finality. "I don't want to eat hummus in Damascus."

Marking 65 years since the Iasi Massacre

By BARUCH COHEN

Guest Voice

"It makes no difference to me that we'll go down in history as barbarians. There has not existed a more favourable moment in our history. If it is needed, shoot all of them with machine guns. – Marshal Ion Antonescu, Romania's fuhrer, declaring Romanian government policy concerning the Jews, on June 21, 1941.

In 1930, 35,462 Jews lived in Iasi, Romania. The number of Jewish people living in the city increased to 51,000 between 1940 and 1941, when surrounding villages and towns forced their local Jewish populations to leave. However, Iasi was far from accommodating and was known as a centre of anti-Semitic activity. Its Jews had suffered from pogroms initiated by Romanian fascists and students in 1899 and 1923.

Notwithstanding sporadic intervention by Allied forces prior to World War I, Romanian governments consistently refused to recognize Jews as Romanian nationals. At the Versailles Conference in 1919, the Romanian government reluctantly accepted a treaty granting Jews citizenship, but the statute, incorporated into the Paris Peace Treaty of 1919, was never fully honoured.

With the exception of a few hundred families, most Romanian Jews remained resident aliens and suffered gross disabilities and enduring persecution. In 1937, during the Nazi regime of Octavian Goga, 225,000 Jews were stripped of their citizenship and an additional 91,000 were classified as foreigners.

In 1930, the infamous Iron Guard was created in Romania as a successor to the Christian National Defence League, founded in 1923. On September 8, 1940, Marshal Ion Antonescu proclaimed Iasi to be the capital of the Iron Guard under his Fascist-Nazi regime. It was at this time that the persecution of the city's Jews began, by measures taken against them such as arbitrary arrests, extortion, property confiscation, seizure of businesses, and trials of suspects charged with belonging to the illicit Communist Party. In November 1940, two majestic synagogues were destroyed on orders from the Iron Guard.

On the eve of war against the Soviet Union, Romanian military authorities were stationed at Iasi, which was also an assembly point for Romanian and German army units. On June 28, 1941, following the circulation of false rumours that Jews had abetted Soviet planes bombing the city, assaults on the Jewish people living in Iasi began. These pogroms were organized by the members of the Romanian Special Intelligence Service, the liaison office with the German military. In Christian homes in Romania, crosses and icons were displayed, as well as placards proclaiming, "Here live Christians, not Jydani [Jews]."

Air raid sirens were sounded as a false war signal that had actually been preplanned by organizers of the impending Jewish massacre. And later that night, the sky was lit up with rocket fire as a signal to begin the slaughter.

On June 29, 1941, dubbed Duminica Aceia ("Black Sunday") by the Romanian Jewish population, thousands of Jews were arrested and shot by Romanian soldiers outside police headquarters. An additional 4,300 Jews were placed in closed cargo vans and crowded into cattle cars on trains, where 2,650 people died of thirst or suffocation. Many of those who survived suffered extreme emotional and mental trauma. The Nazi governor of Krakow, Otto Wachter, with a tone of disgust, deemed this to be "an uncivilized method," as reported by the Italian journalist Cyrzio Malaparte in his famous book Kaput.

June 29, 1941, became the bloodiest day in the history of the Jews in Romania. Duminica Aceia signalled the beginning of the Final Solution, the German Nazi scheme to remove Jewish existence from European soil.

No other country has had a darker record in the treatment of Jews than Romania. It was the most virulently anti-Semitic country in pre-war Europe, its anti-Semitism vitriolic and venomous, unparalleled in Eastern Europe with the possible exception of Poland.

Romania was Germany's most devoted satellite state, an ardent military ally, not a conquered country. According to Nora Levin in her book The Holocaust, an estimated 14,000 Jews were massacred in Iasi on that Sunday known as Duminica Aceia.

To this day, the truth about the Iasi massacre, in which Jews were bludgeoned to death with utmost barbarity, is not acknowledged by Romanian authorities, the Romanian Orthodox Church or by Romanian historians and academics. The official version of events that is propagated, as cited by Radu Ioanid in The Holocaust in Romania, is remarkably inadequate. It reads: "In Iasi, 500 Jewish communists were executed. They fired at German and Romanian soldiers from their homes." To this day, after 65 years, the Romanian anti-Semitic press feeds the public this flagrant lie.

Romania is today the only country in postwar Europe that has erected monuments, named streets and constructed plaques honouring the Nazi Iron Guard leadership from the darkest and most terrible time in Romanian history.

Remember! Zachor!

June 29, 1941, Duminica Aceia (preceded by the "Bucharest Kristallnacht" on Jan. 21-23, 1941) became the starting signal – not only for the Romanian Nazi regime, but for all of Nazi-dominated Europe – to annihilate, to murder, six million Jews, including 350,000 Romanian Jews.

Zachor! Remember!

* * *

The Jewish community of Iasi, established in the 16th century, was known for its highly developed cultural life, its Zionist and Chassidic movements, and its renowned community member, Abraham Goldfaden, who organized the world's first professional Yiddish theatre in Iasi.

In 2006, the Iasi Jewish community numbers some 270 families!

The masks we wear

Books
Bernard Baskin

Which is your favourite mask? We've got trunks full of them. One kind of mask is fashioned by external circumstances. Not infrequently a man who has made it big suddenly dons a mask. His friends of humbler days no longer recognize him. "I don't know what's gotten into George. He doesn't seem the same any more." A woman who enters into high society often displays the mask of indifference to family members.

The more honest we become about ourselves, the more impressed we are with the devious façades behind which our emotions are prone to conceal themselves. Abnormal fears wear the masks of pain, hate masquerades as love, guilt assumes the appearance of innocence, cowardice promenades as illness and shame seeks the cloak of respectability.

T. S. Eliot wrote, "There will be time to prepare a face to meet the faces that you meet." Putting on the mask is the first requisite of going out into the polite and, even more important, impolite society. "False face must hide what the false heart doth know," wrote Shakespeare.

But, wait, we have not explored this truth completely. The fact is that certain masks are quite indispensable. If we could not mask our true feelings, how could we perform our assigned tasks? The salesman soliciting an order may be quite worried about his sick child at home, but unless he can put on the mask of enthusiasm for his product, he will not be able to provide for him. The restaurant hostess may be heartsick over a shattered marriage, but unless she can wear the mask of good cheer, she may soon find herself without a job. The professional counsellor may have a host of problems gnawing away at his equanimity, but unless he can put on the mask of certainty and composure, he will soon lose his usefulness to those who enlist his aid. The grieving widow may carry an awesome burden of sorrow, but if she cannot manage to mask her true feelings, she may find friends hard to come by.

Any one of us may find ourselves at the bedside of a dear friend or a loved one who is suffering from a fatal disease, but unless we can put on the mask of hopefulness and confidence, we will betray our mission of mercy. As a façade behind which to conceal painful emotions, masks are not only permissible, they are priceless.

Let us go one stop further and suggest that masks can even enhance our lives. We can grow in mind and spirit if we learn to wear the mask of human beings we admire – not in order to pretend to be what we are not, but rather as a means of aspiring to be what we can become. Do you want to become kinder and more sympathetic, then assume the pose of the kindly and sympathetic person. Do you want to become more understanding and merciful, then don the masks of understanding and mercy.

Someone has said with fine insight, "Act human and you will become human." In the very process of simulating the roles of a exemplary person, we can take an impressive forward stride in self-improvement. That, it seems, was the point of Hamlet's advice to his mother, "Assume a virtue if you have it not."

The Rescue at Entebbe, Pt. 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

"This operation will certainly be inscribed in the annals of military history, in legend and in national tradition." Those are the words of Yitzhak Rabin, the Israeli prime minister who gave the go-ahead for the raid on Entebbe, Uganda, 30 years ago next week. Today, a look at the legacy of Entebbe.

Of course, the rescue had a profound personal effect on anyone who cared about the fate of Israel. Jonathan Rosenblum was studying in an ulpan in the summer of 1976 and remembers the tension and then the joy that filled the air. "Complete strangers were embracing on the bus. For once Jewish unity seemed like a reality, not a fundraiser's slogan. As I looked around the bus, one thought kept recurring: we are all Jews. The obvious differences between us – language, skin colour, personal and familial history suddenly seemed unimportant." [http://tinyurl.com/qmz2t]

Decades later, Rosenblum put those events into perspective. "While the first realization of the miracle of the Entebbe rescue will always rank as one of the happiest moments of my life, the memory today is a bittersweet one. For it always calls in its wake the question: will we Jews in the Land of Israel ever again experience the same feelings of unity we did that morning?"

And what about the generation born after the raid? Has Entebbe lived for them "in legend and in national tradition" as Rabin predicted? Unfortunately, a survey conducted earlier this year found that 30 per cent of Israelis aged 18 to 22 had no knowledge of the rescue operation. A similar percentage of young people had never heard of Yonatan Netanyahu, the leader of the mission and the lone Israeli military casualty. [http://tinyurl.com/q3bzs]

I was interested to read what impact the raid on Entebbe had on the people of Uganda. Ugandan political commentator Charles Onyango-Obbo says that before the raid then-President Idi Amin had established a powerful army that terrorized his people into submission. But the raid "shattered his aura of invincibility. Nothing Amin did after that could rebuild his grip on the country." [http://tinyurl.com/ohjvr]

And what of the fallen dictator? Amin was dethroned in 1979 by Tanzanian troops joined by Ugandan dissidents. He fled to Saudi Arabia, reportedly arriving with his two wives and 24 children. He died there in 2003. [http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Idi_Amin]

A story as powerful as Entebbe's has proven irresistible to filmmakers. Victory at Entebbe cast Burt Lancaster as Minister of Defence Shimon Peres and Richard Dreyfuss as Netanyahu. [http://tinyurl.com/qogxv] A second, superior production, Raid on Entebbe, had Peter Finch as Rabin and Yaphet Kotto as Amin. [http://tinyurl.com/rcbb4] And the Israeli-produced Mivtsa Yonatan (Operation Thunderbolt) featured Gila Almagor with Yehoram Gaon as Netanyahu. [http://tinyurl.com/mpwd5] Operation Thunderbolt was nominated for best foreign language film in 1977.

Right after the rescue, the Organization of African Unity initiated a complaint in the United Nations condemning Israel's "act of aggression" against a member state of the United Nations. Soviet delegate Mikhail Kharlamov said "however much the representative of Israel might have tried to refute the irrefutable, the armed action against Uganda was an act of direct, flagrant aggression." On the other hand, Kaj Sundberg of Sweden said that although Sweden was "unable to reconcile the Israeli action with the strict rules of the Charter, [it] did not find it possible to join in a condemnation in such a case." In the end, the Security Council did not adopt the resolution condemning Israel. [http://home.att.net/~slomansonb/Entebbe.html]

I'll leave the last word to then-Israeli ambassador Chaim Herzog (later the country's sixth president) who delivered these eloquent remarks as the UN debated the legality of Israel's actions in Entebbe [http://tinyurl.com/qkckj]: "We are proud of what we have done because we have demonstrated to the world that in a small country – in Israel's circumstances – the dignity of man, human life and human freedom constitute the highest values. We are proud not only because we have saved the lives of over 100 innocent people – men, women and children – but because of the significance of our act for the cause of human freedom." [http: //tinyurl.com/mo3jz]

Chavi Rosenzweig speaks at fundraiser

By JENNA ROSMAN
CJN Intern

"There comes a time in life when you realize that when you stand still, you will remain at this point forever. You realize that if you keep looking to the ground, life will pass you by," said David Rosenzweig's widow, Chavi.

Rosenzweig was fatally stabbed the night of July 13, 2002, his birthday, while helping his son change a tire on Bathurst Street near Dell Park Avenue.

"Life is a journey, a journey of discovery. Circumstances might not always be as you want them to be. Life may not always go as planned," she said.

Rosenzweig was speaking to an auditorium of more than 100 women at an Em Habonim Smecha fundraising event at Bais Yaakov Elementary School recently.

"It is through my ongoing search for truth and meaning that I am more prepared to honour HaKodesh Baruch Hu," she said.

"This for me has become a lifelong endeavour. Every achievement in life's search and struggle is an accomplishment. And every accomplishment along life's journey possesses an element of uncertainty."

Em Habonim Smecha provides counselling and support for more than 450 single-parent families in Israel.

Former Broadway entertainer, Rachel Factor, who has performed in various stage productions including Miss Saigon and Shogun, performed J.A.P – her one-woman autobiographical show – at the event.

Factor, who is Japanese-American, converted to Orthodox Judaism, and now lives in Israel with her husband and two children.

The late Rebecca Teles, who dedicated her life to serving various organizations in support of Israel, and was the recipient of the Ontario Home Association's Lifetime Achievement Award in 1992, was also honoured at the event.

Israel a leader in disaster management, doctor says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Hospitals in North American cities have a lot to learn from Israeli disaster management techniques, a physician told an international conference in Toronto last week.

Dr. Mauricio Lynn, an associate professor of surgery at the University of Miami who served in the Israeli Air Force for 18 years, said hospitals in Israel are generally better equipped to handle mass casualties than are those in North America.

On the eve of delivering a speech to the World Conference on Disaster Management, Lynn said in an interview that Israeli methods are transferrable.

"Israel has produced protocols and templates that can be adapted by any hospital. Israel should serve as an example to other countries."

Israeli doctors and nurses in about two dozen hospitals have been well trained and drilled to deal with disasters, particularly those caused by terrorism, he added.

Since the Sept. 11 terror attacks in the United States, major American medical facilities have come a long way in learning to cope with such disasters, but they are still in need of more knowledge and further training, he said.

"We're better prepared than before Sept. 11, but we have to keep practising and continuing to learn."

Asked whether Canadian hospitals in urban areas are ready to handle a large number of casualties, Lynn said he has not studied the situation here.

Apart from terror attacks, he said, hospitals must be able to cope with natural disasters such as earthquakes and airplane crashes in which there are survivors.

Lynn, who is also medical director at the Center for Bloodless Medicine at the University of Miami/Jackson Memorial Medical Center, completed his undergraduate studies in Rio de Janeiro and his residency at the Tel Aviv University Sackler School of Medicine.

While serving in the Israel Defence Forces, he worked in an air evacuation and rescue unit and was head of the trauma department.

Lynn's clinical and research interests range from general surgery and bleeding control to hemorrhagic shock and hemostasis.

Morah Janice teaches 'how to be a good person'

A lesson from the teacher: "I try to teach children that everybody makes mistakes. It's a lifelong lesson. If you don't try, you never know if you can succeed. I think that it applies to everybody."

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Do Janice Feldman's 22 students really learn everything they need to know in her kindergarten class at the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School?

"Kids will always learn how to read and write, but learning how to be a good person is number 1 in this classroom," says the school's senior kindergarten teacher. That's why, for instance, she gently reminds children who are talking during "Show and Share" to please show respect to their classmate.

"They are our teachers..."

Feldman, a mother of three, tries to bring humour and an easygoing style into her classroom.

"We do everything we can to make sure everyone's comfortable, then that's when learning can happen," she said in a recent interview.

The learning she refers to is evident in the students' work that adorns the classroom, including crayoned pictures illustrating trips they would like to take if they could go anywhere in the world, accompanied by painstakingly printed names of destinations and modes of transport.

It's also apparent when Feldman conducts part of her morning circle completely in Hebrew. Her class is the entry point for DJDS students, and they have not necessarily been exposed to Hebrew previously.

Seeing how far they've come makes the end of the school year special for Feldman, who recently received a Teacher of Excellence award, a privately sponsored award for Toronto Jewish day school teachers. "This is the time of year when you really love it, when you look at how much [the students] have grown and how much they've learned," she told The CJN.

A native of Toronto, where she attended Associated Hebrew Schools and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Feldman says she always wanted to be a teacher. She has a bachelor of arts degree from York University and a bachelor of education from the University of Toronto.

Feldman (née Kaiman) began her teaching career more than 20 years ago, first at Associated, then at a Jewish day school in Southfield, Mich., a suburb of Detroit, when her husband was studying across the border in Windsor. She taught for eight years at Netivot HaTorah Day School, then took a three-year hiatus before joining the DJDS eight years ago at its inception. At the time, her class had only six children.

Her classroom approach has evolved to focus on students' critical thinking skills and ability to ask questions, as well as on including varied Jewish backgrounds, and on an integrated Jewish and general studies curriculum, all in line with the DJDS' philosophy.

She sees her role now as more of a "mediator" rather than someone who is "handing information down.

"The kids often don't realize they're doing reading, writing and math, because it's done in a fun, integrated way," she said. "We don't say, 'Now it's time for math,' or 'Now it's time for reading.'"

She encourages parents to ask their children "why" and "how" questions – for instance, at the grocery store: "Why do you think we should pick that?" – as she does at school.

"Understanding why things happen is bigger than just knowing that they happen," she said.

Feldman is about to take a year's leave of absence, but she's looking forward to returning in 2007. "I wouldn't be here if I didn't love it."

"They are our teachers..." will resume at the end of September.

Heschel School celebrates 10th anniversary

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

This year's Grade 8 class at the Toronto Heschel School is its fifth graduating class, but it's the first to include students who have been with the school since junior kindergarten.

That milestone is one of the changes that marks Heschel's 10th anniversary, which the school celebrated at a gala evening earlier this month.

Principal Gail Baker, one of five founders of the school, was honoured at the event, along with co-founders Ellen Kessler, Judith Leitner, Baruch Rand (the school's first principal) and Rachael Turkienicz.

Managing the school's growth while maintaining its "mission and vision" has been the school's biggest challenge, said Baker recently.

With 325 students – up from 52 spread over junior kindergarten to Grade 2 at its inception – the school's size is still "manageable," says Baker, a mother of three who, in addition to her administrative duties, still teaches Judaic arts, a program that looks at art and literature through a Jewish lens.

The school came about after Rand suggested to Baker that they open a school together. Both were members of the same synagogue, and each ran a Sunday school.

An initial information night about the would-be day school drew 50 people, despite a February blizzard, affirming their vision of an arts-based school that would cater to "multiple intelligences" – the idea that different students learn in different ways, and in ways other than the traditional linguistic and logical-mathematical modes, including through music and movement.

"We were very idealistic," said Baker of the founders and the original staff of 11, who were attracted to the school's arts-based, environmentally sensitive, egalitarian, and multi-denominational approach. "This is the little school that grew."

Enrolment doubled in Heschel's second year from 52 to 105, and increased the following year to 185. Today there are about as many staff members as there were students the first year.

In September, the school will amalgamate its two existing campuses at a former public school building at Faywood Boulevard and Sheppard Avenue W., which has been its junior high location since 2004. Younger students are currently at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, where the school has been located since its inception, and some classes were housed at Adath Israel Congregation from 2000 to 2004.

Now that Heschel will have exclusive use of the Sheppard building, students have begun to plant an expanded organic garden there.

"We'll have vegetables again, and some will be donated to food banks, as always," Baker said. "A very strong environmental ethos really permeates a lot of the curriculum."

With students from different denominational backgrounds, the school makes an effort to promote integration. Its kashrut policy is one example.

"What's kosher for one family may not be kosher for another, especially around cheese," said Baker. "We encourage parents to ask, and not to feel offended."

Egalitarianism at Heschel, also a potentially delicate issue, means "equal opportunity for everybody… within Halachah," said Baker. Boys and girls both cover their heads, but the coverings are not necessarily the same for the two groups, she explained.

Also, children below bar and bat mitzvah age can learn Torah and read from the Torah, but parental preferences kick in at their coming of age.

Prayer services include a "Heschel minyan" where males and females sit together and girls can read from the Torah, but students are also exposed to a variety of services so that they can learn to "navigate" them and feel comfortable outside their own Jewish milieu.

"We don't teach that something is 'not right' or 'more Jewish,'" said Baker. "We're trying to build an inclusive school."

The late Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel, for whom the school is named, believed that Judaism should be a unifying force, not a divisive one, she noted.

Certain concepts, she said, are central to Judaism, and to the school: Shabbat, and one God, for example. "But we talk about different expressions of this. Some people don't drive on Shabbat. Other families maybe have a challah [but do drive]. The core concepts remain."

'Prisoners' document' requires greater scrutiny

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Just as last week's column on the Palestinian "prisoners' document" ("Vote on jailhouse plan won't solve anything," CJN, June 22) was going to press, a front-page National Post headline proclaimed "Hamas, Fatah in unity talks."

In the June 19 Post report, Jonathan Ferziger wrote: "Leaders of the Hamas and Fatah movements said… they are close to reaching an agreement on a coalition government that will seek the end of international sanctions against the Palestinian Authority."

Ferziger also reported that Hamas was about to accept the prisoners' document, disagreeing with Fatah only on three of 18 articles. "If such a deal is reached," he noted, "[PA President Mahmoud] Abbas has indicated he will call off a July 26 referendum on the initiative, which Hamas has said amounts to an attempt to overthrow its government."

Ferziger wrote that "the deepening financial crisis [in the territories] has pressured [Hamas] to adopt a more pragmatic stance." However, he failed to provide any solid evidence of what this "more pragmatic" position amounts to, since he did not critically examine what's in the prisoners' document.

In "Hamas ponders sacrificing ideology for political gain," (Financial Times, June 19), Harvey Morris wrote that Hamas was considering "whether to sacrifice some of its ideology in exchange for safeguarding political gains made in last January's elections.

"Depending on the outcome of its deliberations, the PA could within weeks have a new national unity government with a platform of negotiating with Israel, or face a potentially divisive national referendum and worsening relations between Hamas and Fatah."

Nothing in the prisoners' document accepts a genuine two-state solution, or endorses UN resolutions, such as 242 and 338, that call for broad Middle East peace. Morris noted that Hamas is "still balking" at accepting "Arab and UN resolutions on the conflict" and endorsing "the concept of a two-state solution."

He added: "Even if Hamas accepted the prisoners' document, there is no guarantee this would meet Quartet demands for it to recognize Israel, abandon violence and accept previous agreements with Israel before direct aid to the government could resume."

So it appears that any optimism about possible pragmatism by Hamas is not supported by hard evidence.

Contrary to numerous media reports, the prisoners' document does not, even implicitly, require the recognition of Israel. And whether it eventually accepts this document or a version of it, Hamas can hold to its rejectionist stand vis-à-vis Israel without fear of compromising its religiously based rejection of Jewish sovereignty on what it considers "sacred Islamic land."

What several Israeli analysts have pointed out is that, at best, Hamas might use Western naivete about the "prisoners' document" to accept only a temporary ceasefire with Israel without renouncing its stated goal of eliminating the Jewish state. The repeated references in the document to the "right of return" of Palestinians underscore that determination.

In its June 10 editorial "Palestinian Peace Politics," the New York Times described how the document's refusal to explicitly recognize Israel, its endorsement of terrorism in the territories, and its call for the return of refugees to "pre-1967 Israel" amount to a major retreat from the promise of Oslo 13 years ago: "For these and other reasons, the prisoners' proposal is unacceptable even to dovish Israelis, and in its present form, can represent no more than an initial bargaining position."

But whether, in any version, the document even represents that much is very doubtful.

Western audiences crave good news from the Middle East and will cling to any hope for peace. But when writing about the prisoners' document – and Hamas – journalists need to ask tough questions not only about the document but also about Hamas' so-called "pragmatic turn."

LEO BAECK GRADS: Michael Bryant, the attorney general of Ontario, addressed the first graduating class of Leo Baeck Day School's Holy Blossom campus last week. "Show up," he advised them, reminding them that opportunities can never be seized if you aren't there to embrace them or are unaware that they exist. The 22 students have watched the Holy Blossom campus grow to more than 300 students in 12 years, now encompassing the full Leo Baeck program from senior kindergarten to Grade 8. On their final day at the school, the graduating students delivered more than 200 letters about the humanitarian disaster in the Darfur region of Sudan to the office of local MP Joe Volpe for him to deliver to Prime Minister Stephen Harper.

Landry weighs in on sovereignty and Jews

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Jewish community should stay neutral in a future Quebec referendum on sovereignty, former premier Bernard Landry said.

Speaking in French on June 19 to a group of 150 people at the Gelber Conference Centre as part of the Festival Sefarad, Landry said during a question-and-answer session that it should be left up to "Québécois et Québécoises" to campaign publicly in the build-up to a referendum vote.

In speaking about Jews, however, he appeared to be referring to the organized Jewish community, not individual Jews.

Yet, Landry had earlier made the case forcefully that members of the Jewish community were every bit as "Québécois" as the descendants of the province's founding settlers.

"You are us," he told the audience.

To the left and rear of Landry were the flags of Quebec, Canada and France, which was a financial sponsor of the festival.

The audience greeted Landry warmly, but questions following his extemporaneous talk, while very polite, had an unmistakably federalist bent.

Landry's talk was billed as being "cultural" and focused on whether Montreal could be the "Cordoba" of the future, a reference to Cordoba's legacy as a cultural centre, as well as an allusion to the "Golden Age" of Spanish Jewry.

But he spent a significant portion of his address articulating the reasons for Quebec's status as a "nation" (and for all its population being counted as members of that nation), as well as defending the need for Quebec sovereignty, explaining the Quiet Revolution, and discussing why all ethnic Quebecers are equally "Québécois" in every sense and should not see themselves as a part of a multicultural society.

"Quebec is multi-ethnic but not multicultural," he said. He described multiculturalism as an "error" and an idea that reinforces differences instead of binding people together as a "nation" with common purpose and values.

"Quebec is a modern nation of diverse origins," he said, describing Quebecers of all stripes as equal members of that "nation."

As an example, Landry cited Jews and Palestinians at Concordia University, who he said should see themselves as Quebecers of Jewish or Palestinian origin, not as Jews or Palestinians "first."

During the question-and-answer period, Landry was asked whether, given Quebec's success without sovereignty, the drive for independence is an example of "a solution looking for a problem."

Landry replied that, just as in the case of the creation of Israel, sovereignty provides the best guarantee for maximizing a nation's full potential.

Another questioner then noted that Quebec's success was accomplished as part of Canada.

Maybe so, Landry replied, but he said that if Quebec was independent, it would be "even more successful.

"It's not an economic question, it's a question of dignity," he added.

Landry cited a list of Quebec's achievements, ranging from Quebec being the longest "continuous" democracy in North America (because of the U.S. Civil War) and a welcoming presence for millions of immigrants of diverse origins, to its emergence from the "economic domination" of anglophones, to its cultural achievements, to its success in high tech and other fields, "and its remarkable use of human values and creativity."

He also cited Quebec's linguistic progress but emphasized the need to guard against the decline of French.

He specifically used the word "convivialité," chosen by the Festival Sefarad as its theme, to describe the harmonious relations between Quebecers of all origins.

Landry said Quebec rejects intolerance of all kinds.

ORT volunteer wants others to get involved

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Nathalie Rethazy, an ORT Canada volunteer, is on a mission.

The 29-year-old pharmaceutical salesperson, originally from Dundas, Ont., wants to get more young people involved in ORT, a not-for-profit technological and professional training organization, and in the Jewish community.

She became involved with ORT about five years ago, she says, when she was living in Israel and volunteered teaching English at an ORT school in Na'alot.

"When I came back, I could no longer help the children directly, but I wanted the opportunity to help indirectly."

She became part of ORT Toronto's professional leaders' group, and about two years ago, she and co-chair Shawna Gall organized the pair's first fundraising event, a cocktail party/silent auction that raised $5,000.

"The money was earmarked for an ORT school, and I had visited it while I was in Israel. I knew how much they needed our help," Rethazy says.

"We had several hundred people attend the party, and most of them knew very little about ORT. We opened their eyes."

Many, however, feel their lives are too busy to get involved in volunteer work, she says.

"I keep stressing that no matter how much time they have, they can make a difference. Even if they have one hour in a week, they can get a small job done – e-mailing, printing, picking up donations. Every little bit helps.

"Once they start, I guarantee they'll get hooked. They'll see the results of their efforts, they'll make friends, and they'll work together with them towards a common goal. The small amount of time they give will take them into a different world."

A graduate of the Hamilton Hebrew Academy, Rethazy says that volunteering is in her blood. "I was a volunteer teaching assistant at Hebrew school, and I was involved in the synagogue."

Even though she and her husband have no children yet, he volunteered to be a hockey coach because he wanted to teach children to play a team sport, she says.

"When we do have children, we want to instill in them the value of volunteerism."

Her volunteer work has given her the opportunity to meet people she wouldn't ordinarily meet, she says.

"I've also gained skills, such as public speaking, budgeting and bookkeeping, fundraising, approaching prospective sponsors, and organizing events. I'm certainly ready to make a bar mitzvah [when the day comes.]"

Gall says she volunteers for ORT "because it is a strong worldwide organization that unites children of all races and cultures, and provides practical education.

"Our 30something generation needs to become more involved with ORT. [We can] help ORT teach skills that will allow young people to become self-sufficient, confident and productive members of society."

Death Valley bike ride supports juvenile diabetes research

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

One day in February, Queen's University occupational-therapy student Samantha Spencer woke up to a radio announcement about a fundraising project for research into juvenile diabetes.

That's how she came to ride a bicycle 120 kilometres in 104-degree heat through Death Valley, Calif.

Death Valley is the lowest point in the United States – 282 feet (86 metres) below sea level. It also has registered the highest temperatures there.

Spencer, 25, was not just looking for an adventure. Her brother Matthew, 22, has had juvenile diabetes since he was 14. "He manages it well," she said, "but I see how hard it is to deal with the needles and blood-sugar monitoring."

Juvenile diabetes, also called diabetes type 1, is mostly found in children and young adults. It means that the body does not make insulin, and the person must take insulin shots every day, carefully monitor their blood sugar, diet and exercise levels.

A lifelong condition ("so far," Spencer noted), if uncontrolled it can cause blindness, nerve damage, even heart disease or stroke.

Spencer said that she and her family have always done the annual walk to raise money for the Juvenile Diabetes Research Fund of Canada, but "it's hard to ask for money for the same thing."

The way that these bike rides, organized by Juvenile Diabetes Research Fund International, work, she explained, is that if you raise a certain amount of money, $5,000 Canadian at least, you can take part.

Starting in February, Spencer, her parents and even her brother, started working. She sent out e-mails to "everyone I could think of – even my professors." She and Matthew held a wine and cheese fundraiser in Kingston, and organized an auction of Lululemon sports bags that had been donated to the cause.

By May, she had raised $8,200.

Fundraising wasn't the only preparation Spencer had to do. For one thing, although she rode her bike around the neighbourhood with the other kids as a child, at that point "I didn't even have a bike. The last one I had was pink and had streamers on it," Spencer said.

She trained in Kingston, where a local bicycle store, Cyclepath, "adopted me," she said. They trained her, took her biking, and offered any help and advice she needed.

Finally, in May, she and her mother, Fern, who volunteered to help at the event, set off for Death Valley. They joined 77 other riders, who had also raised the required sum of money.

Everyone started the ride together, she said. At any point, participants could either turn around and ride back to the starting point, or just go as far as they could, and wait for a van to come along and transport them back.

The last mile was entirely downhill, Spencer said, and everyone rode down that hill to the base.

The event was not a race, Spencer stressed. "Everyone was so friendly and supportive. They helped each other, talked and joked. Everyone was there for the same cause."

The ride itself was a challenge, she said. The participants took electrolyte pills, salt, water and diluted Gatorade. Food and water were provided at the rest stops, which were located every 20 or so miles. Spencer's mother was stationed at a rest stop at Badwater, at the lowest point of the valley.

The ride raised $266,000 for research into juvenile diabetes.

Spencer said that she is eager to do the ride again. "I just have to find new, creative ways to fundraise."

For more information about the ride, visit www.jdrf.org, and click on "rides" or e-mail Samantha Spencer at spencer.samantha@gmail.com.

MITZVAH KIDS: Candace Steinhart, left, who has type 1 diabetes (sometimes called juvenile diabetes), and David Kornhauser, whose sister has the same condition, donated $1,000 each from their bat and bar mitzvah gifts to the Juvenile Diabetes Research Foundation (JDRF). Accepting the cheques on behalf of JDRF is fundraising manager Marla Ingles.

Samantha Spencer, who rode a bicycle through Death Valley to raise funds for juvenile diabetes research, is with her mother, Fern, at one of the rest stops – the Badwater – on the bike route. The Badwater is 282 feet below sea level, the lowest point in the United States.

Hillel advised to create more diverse atmosphere

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Jewish students in this country have a higher level of Jewish identification than their U.S. counterparts, but Hillel needs to create a more welcoming, as well as politically and religiously diverse, atmosphere if it wants to attract more of them on Canadian campuses.

Those are the key conclusions of a research study done for Hillel of Greater Toronto about Canadian Jewish students. It was based on a similar study done in the United States last year on the so-called "millennial generation," young people born between 1982 and 2002.

The main objective of the study, completed by Northstar Research Partners, was to gain a better understanding of attitudes, opinions and interests of Canadian Jewish students on the topic of Jewish living.

Other objectives were to determine what students think of Hillel and the people involved in it, and what characteristics students want in a Jewish student organization.

Zac Kaye, executive director of Hillel of Greater Toronto, said at a recent presentation that the study was commissioned after the U.S. study was completed because Hillels in this country wanted "to look at Canadian students and delve into issues unique to them."

David Sevitt, research associate with Northstar, said questionnaires were sent by e-mail to about 6,000 students across the country, of which 641 were completed.

As in the U.S. study, Northstar used a "Jewish Identification Index" to segment students' levels of Jewish affiliation into high, moderate or low, Sevitt said.

Release of study on Canadian 'Millennials'

"Moderates," who identify as Jewish but are not yet active in Jewish groups, comprised 44 per cent of the students, while 36 per cent were classified as "high" and 20 per cent as "low."

The U.S. study found that the "lows," at 40 per cent, are the largest sub-group of U.S. Jewish students, so Canadian students have a comparatively higher level of Jewish identity, Sevitt said. (Twenty eight per cent of U.S. respondents were classified as "high" and 32 per cent as "moderate").

In asking students about Hillel, Sevitt said, Northstar found that across the country, they are universally aware of the organization.

"There is clearly no awareness issue," he said. "A healthy proportion of students sign up for Hillel, and their two top reasons are to find out about [campus] activities, and to meet other students."

The study focused on "moderates" because they're the ones that Hillel has the best chance of reaching, Sevitt said.

Although most "moderates" have an interest in Hillel, he said, only two per cent participate often in its programs. "The challenge is not getting people to come in the first place. It is getting them to return."

The top reason students cited for not returning to Hillel, was that they were too busy. "[Other reasons] were that they found a Jewish connection elsewhere, they don't relate to the people that go there, they don't hear about the programs, or they don't feel welcome."

When asked about their Hillel experience, Sevitt said, about 50 per cent of respondents said they perceived those who participate in Hillel programs as "cliquey. A welcoming atmosphere was a key desire among all students."

While 50 per cent of "moderates" say that supporting Israel is important, all students agree that it's important to combat anti-Semitism, and about two-thirds want Hillel staff to be knowledgeable about Judaism."

They also want Jewish organizations to be "open to new ideas and provide a welcoming atmosphere for all political and religious viewpoints, and for everyone, Jewish and non-Jewish."

The latter request is not surprising, Sevitt said, because most "moderates" have a mix of Jewish and non-Jewish friends.

Whereas about 60 per cent of Jewish students have been to Israel – one-quarter of them through birthright israel – only about half appear to be more involved in Israel-related programs or events when they return, he said. "Only 20 per cent are likely to participate in pro-Israel advocacy."

Sevitt said that as an organization, Hillel is highly regarded, but it still faces a number of challenges. "It needs to work on creating a diverse, welcoming atmosphere, and it needs to make a [greater] effort to advise students of events."

It also has to translate the students' love of Israel into more involvement in pro-Israel activities, he said. "We have to reframe Israel advocacy in a way that is attractive to them."

Food, Scrumptious Food

Cooking Kindness benefits cancer research

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Last December, I received a phone call from Gloria Guttman asking me to edit a fundraising cookbook she had been working on for the last five years. The book was called Cooking Kindness: Heroes in the Kitchen ($36 Cdn). The proceeds would benefit Israel Cancer Research Fund, helping support Israeli scientists who continue to "cook up" and discover new remedies in the battle against cancer.

Although we had never met, I was quickly impressed by Gloria's passion, vision and commitment to this immense project. Energetic beyond her years, this vibrant, dynamic woman convinced me to take on the project. I'm so glad I did.

Gloria felt that this book shouldn't be just about food and recipes – it had to have soul! And she accomplished her goal.

Cooking Kindness is a compilation of more than 200 recipes from Gloria's family, friends and colleagues. Forty-four people contributed their favourite recipes to the book. The remainder came from Gloria's huge personal recipe collection, illustrating her passion for delicious food and her love of entertaining.

Gloria is a superb marketer, reaching out as far away as Coral Springs, Fla., where she will be featured as an author in January 2007. Gloria even arranged to have the book sold in the gift shop at Oakdale Golf Club in Toronto. When the book was displayed amidst the men's shirts, she tactfully arranged to have them moved next to the cash to increase their visibility. A true saleswoman, Gloria can even be found selling cookbooks in the ladies' locker room at her golf club!

Cooking Kindness is available at Chapters, by e-mailing gguttman04@earthlink.net or calling 416-440-7999.

SALMON WITH MAPLE GLAZE

1 cup pure maple syrup
4 tbsp. fresh lemon juice, divided use
3 tbsp. soy sauce
2 tbsp. fresh ginger, peeled and finely grated
1½ tsp. minced garlic
salt and pepper to taste
1 salmon fillet (1.2 kg) centre cut, skin on
1 bunch scallions, green part

In a small heavy saucepan, combine maple syrup with 3 tablespoons of lemon juice, soy sauce, ginger, garlic, salt and pepper. Bring to a boil. Reduce heat and simmer, uncovered, until reduced to about 1 cup, about 30 minutes; stir occasionally. Let cool.

Preheat oven to 350. Lightly oil a shallow baking pan large enough to hold salmon.

Arrange scallions in baking pan to form a bed for salmon. Drizzle ½ cup of maple glaze over salmon. Bake at 350 for 20 to 25 minutes. Baking time depends on thickness of fish.

In a small saucepan, heat the remaining maple glaze over low heat until heated through. This will be used as a sauce. Stir in the remaining tablespoon lemon juice. Remove pan from heat, cover sauce and keep warm.

Cut salmon crosswise into 6 pieces. Drizzle warm sauce over salmon. Yield: 6 servings.

Tip: Maple glaze may be made 2 days ahead, covered and refrigerated. Bring glaze to room temperature before proceeding with recipe.

Despite attack, area residents feel secure

Sunday's predawn raid was carried out jointly by the Popular Resistance Committees terrorist coalition, Islamic Jihad and Hamas. The groups called it revenge for the death of Palestinian civilians in recent Israeli air strikes against Gaza rocket crews.

Despite Sunday's attack, residents of Kerem Shalom, located at the juncture between Egypt, Gaza and Israel, said they still feel more or less secure.

"This incident is not typical," said Amit Caspi, a father of two who moved to the kibbutz a little more than two years ago. Before Israel's withdrawal from the Gaza Strip last summer, "there was much more noise. There was shooting in both directions."

On Sunday, TV crews descended upon the sleepy kibbutz and prepared their evening news broadcasts while Israel Defence Forces troops and Palestinians in Gaza exchanged fire a few hundred yards away.

Inside the kibbutz community centre, a group of soldiers dispatched to the town after Sunday morning's attack played billiards and watched apathetically as England beat Ecuador in a World Cup match.

Unlike larger Jewish towns near northern Gaza, such as Sderot, the area around Kerem Shalom was relatively calm during the last few years of the intifadah. Even when Palestinian militants began firing Qassam rockets out of Gaza, few were aimed at the sparsely populated towns near southern Gaza, which abut a large, empty desert shared by Israel and Egypt. Indeed, there are far more soldiers than civilians in the area.

The involvement in the attack of Hamas, which runs the PA government, prompted senior Israeli officials to redouble their threats against the terrorist group.

Cpl. Gilad Shalit

According to senior political sources, at least two members of Olmert's cabinet demanded that Israeli forces reoccupy parts of Gaza. Olmert is not expected to approve such a sweeping move so early in his term, especially as he is busy trying to lobby support for Israeli withdrawals from the West Bank.

But in comments to fellow ministers, Olmert made clear that the chances were slim for a rapprochement with Abbas, who is seen internationally as a relatively moderate alternative to the Hamas government.

"The State of Israel sees the Palestinian Authority, headed by Chairman Abu Mazen and the Palestinian government, responsible for the incident, with everything that implies," Olmert said, using Abbas' nom de guerre.

After their informal meeting in Jordan last week, Olmert and Abbas were expected to reconvene by month's end or early July for a first peace summit. The attack put that on hold. Israeli sources said Olmert aides indefinitely deferred a meeting with their Palestinian counterparts that had been intended to lay the groundwork for talks.

Infrastructure Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer, a former defence minister, hinted that Israel could step up its military actions in Gaza to include even air strikes against senior Hamas politicians.

"When it comes to terrorism, there is no difference between a prime minister and a suicide bomber," he told Israel Radio. Senior Hamas officials went underground after the attack, fearing Israeli retaliation.

Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni spoke with UN Secretary General Kofi Annan and U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, asking them to press Abbas to secure Shalit's release. She also relayed the message that Israel considers the abduction a test of Abbas' leadership.

Abbas, however, said Hamas is solely responsible for the affair.

In related news, the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigades announced Sunday that it has succeeded in manufacturing chemical and biological weapons. In a leaflet distributed in Gaza, the group, which belongs to Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah Party, said the weapons took three years to make.

The statement, the first of its kind, said the group has managed to make at least 20 different types of biological and chemical weapons. It said it would not hesitate to add the new weapons to Qassam rockets that are being fired at Israeli communities almost daily. It also threatened to use them if Israel carries out its threats to invade Gaza.

"We want to tell Olmert and [Israeli Defence Minister Amir] Peretz that your threats don't frighten us," the leaflet said. "We will surprise you with our new weapons the moment the first soldier sets foot in the Gaza Strip."

Israel's hostage complex

By ANSHEL PFEFFER
Jerusalem Post

Analysis

It's talked about in hushed voices during the dead hours before dawn of a particularly lonely guard shift: "Nohal Hannibal" the Hannibal Directive – the rumoured standard procedure in the eventuality of an Israeli soldier being captured.

In such a case, soldiers are told (although never officially) that their comrades will be given the order to rain fire on the abduction team without consideration for the poor soldier's life. The underlying rationale is that the nation can bear the deaths of soldiers, but not the uncertain fate of a captured serviceman.

Exactly 30 years after the heroic rescue of Air France hostages from Entebbe by an airborne Israel Defence Forces unit, Israel still suffers from a hostage complex. Ongoing warfare at varying levels, which has been Israel's norm for its entire modern history including hostage-taking, soldiers missing-in-action and others held as prisoners-of-war – is a tragic part of the normal scheme of things. Israel regularly captures hundreds of terrorists and other prisoners, and so, the IDF's superiority notwithstanding, it can't be illogical for things to also happen the other way around.

But when it does happen, the system is totally unprepared for the shock. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert announced Sunday that he had given orders not to negotiate over Cpl. Gilad Shalit's life, while it's clear that, if offered a quick diplomatic way out of the tangle, Israel will take it. Or isn't that the reason that Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni is ringing up UN Secretary General Kofi Annan?

Defence Minister Amir Peretz warned anyone who has any influence over Shalit's fate that "his blood will be on his and his leaders' heads," although Peretz is the last person who will sanction a series of summary revenge killings.

And it's not only the miscalculated bluster of politicians. The media is also treating the capture as the central event at Kerem Shalom, much worse than the deaths of Lt. Hanan Barak and St.-Sgt. Pavel Slotsker or the humiliation of the IDF by terrorists.

Once again, it's the Entebbe syndrome. Israel still hasn't learned how to come to terms with a situation where a soldier, or even a citizen, is in enemy hands. The first instinct is to launch a hurriedly prepared operation, such as the one that failed to rescue Golani Brigade soldier Nachshon Wachsman in October 1994 and resulted in the death of one of his would-be rescuers, Nir Poraz. When that proves to be impossible, due to a lack of intelligence or the fact the prisoners have been spirited away to Beirut or some other inaccessible hole, the leadership suddenly loses its backbone and is prepared to pay almost any price.

That's how Hezbollah got dozens of live members back in exchange for the bodies of three soldiers and the return of Elchanan Tannenbaum, who in 2004 was allegedly tricked into going to Beirut in the hope of carrying out a drug deal.

Dozens of Qassam rockets have fallen daily on Sderot and the neighbouring kibbutzim for months and, miraculously, casualties haven't been serious, but the missiles haven't warranted a major operation in Gaza. If Sunday's raid on the IDF outpost had failed, the IDF would probably not be poised to strike now. But because the Palestinians have captured a soldier, the situation has changed completely.

But should that warrant an operation that might drastically alter the balance between Israel and the Palestinians, as well as among the Palestinians themselves, and almost surely exact a heavy price in Israeli and Palestinian lives?

IDF not behind Gaza blast: army

By YAAKOV KATZ
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — A comprehensive laboratory examination of two pieces of shrapnel retrieved from the bodies of Palestinians wounded in an explosion earlier this month on a Gaza beach proves unequivocally that artillery fire from the Israel Defence Forces was not the cause of the blast, an internal military commission said last week.

The head of the commission, Maj.-Gen. Meir Klifi, said the two pieces of shrapnel retrieved from two Palestinians wounded in the explosion, who are currently undergoing treatment at Soroka Hospital in Be'er Sheva, did not come from a 155 mm shell, the type of ordnance used by the IDF earlier that day in attacks on Qassam rocket launch sites.

Klifi said the shrapnel lab results and other findings, including the timing of the incident – according to the IDF, the explosion occurred 10 to 15 minutes after artillery cannons stopped firing shells at a target next to the beach – conclusively exonerated the IDF from responsibility for the blast, which killed seven people.

He said his investigative team had yet to determine the cause of the blast, but it has not ruled out the possibility that it was caused by unexploded Israeli ordnance left lying on the beach weeks or even months ago. While the shrapnel did not match artillery shells fired by the IDF that day, it did, he said, match other types of ordnance in IDF use.

"The examination of a second piece of shrapnel retrieved from the body of a boy who was wounded in the blast unequivocally shows that the explosion was not caused by a 155 mm artillery shell," Klifi told reporters at a press conference at Kirya Military Headquarters in Tel Aviv. "There is a possibility that the explosion was caused by unexploded Israeli ordnance, and it is also possible that the blast was caused by an explosive device planted on the beach by Palestinian terrorists."

Red Cross/Red Crescent movement admits Israel

By RACHEL SILVERMAN
JTA

NEW YORK — Israel's admission to the International Red Cross and Red Crescent movement was the result of 58 years of aggressive, sustained lobbying.

But it also was due to some last-minute, behind-the-scenes maneuvering at the Red Cross conference in Geneva this week.

The conference, which drew 192 Red Cross states and 183 national emergency relief societies, was convened to determine if Israel's emergency services agency, Magen David Adom (MDA), should be allowed to join the international humanitarian organization.

Last Thursday's final vote was decisive: 237 in favour of MDA and 54 against, with 44 abstentions.

Canadian Jewish Congress national president Ed Morgan, in a statement, commended the delegates "who supported the resolution for sending the message that the greater cause of humanitarianism trumped narrow political concerns."

Chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, Marc Gold, said, in a statement, that "despite its lack of official membership, Magen David Adom has been prominent in providing front-line international disaster relief… This is a role we anticipate will be facilitated even further by MDA's full status in the movement."

In a statement, Canadian Foreign Affairs Minister Peter MacKay said that "with the entry of both entities into the movement, and their mutual co-operation, the needs of both Palestinian and Israeli civilians can be more effectively met. Civilians on both sides will benefit from greater access to emergency services and humanitarian protection."

Israel's previous attempts to gain entry into the International Red Cross and Red Crescent movement had been blocked by Arab and Islamic countries, which latched onto the agency's Star of David logo as a pretext to reject the Israeli agency.

But that point of contention was cleared up in December, when a neutral symbol – a red crystal – was allowed. That satisfied the last condition Israel needed to submit its membership application to the Red Cross, though Arab and Islamic countries still did all they could to block the move ahead of the vote.

Reaching that point took decades of work by major Jewish organizations, and the battle also played out in Washington, where a number of legislators made it a priority issue.

The American Red Cross also played a leading role in the campaign. Since 2000, the ARC has withheld $42 million in dues, 25 per cent of the international federation's annual income.

Israel's admission was linked to the admission of the Palestinian Red Crescent Society, which had been relegated to observer status because of a statute admitting agencies only from sovereign states. Changing the statute to allow a simultaneous vote on the Israeli and Palestinian agencies may, in the end, have created more votes for Israel.

Fatah blames Hamas in Syria for attack

By KHALED ABU TOAMEH
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — The attack on the Israel Defence Forces post near the Gaza border was carried out on instructions from the Hamas leadership in Syria, Fatah officials claimed Sunday.

They said the attack, in which two Israeli soldiers were killed and one captured and brought into the Gaza Strip, was designed to torpedo any agreement between Fatah and Hamas on a controversial document drafted by some Palestinian prisoners held in Israeli jails.

As news of the capture spread in the early hours of the morning, many Gaza residents took to the streets to express their joy. Drivers honked horns and some merchants and gunmen gave out sweets. Many expressed hope the abduction would lead to a prisoner swap with Israel.

The attack came only hours after sources in Gaza City reported that Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh were close to reaching an agreement on the so-called "prisoners' document," which had been dismissed by Hamas because it calls for the establishment of a Palestinian state only in the territories captured by Israel in 1967.

The two sides were also close to striking a deal on the formation of a new government that would be dominated by independent figures and technocrats, the sources said.

The Fatah officials accused Damascus-based Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal of seeking to sabotage any deal between Fatah and Hamas.

"It's obvious that those behind the attack wanted to destroy any chance of reaching an agreement between Fatah and Hamas," said a senior Fatah official. "We are convinced that the Hamas leadership in Syria and Lebanon was behind it. They want to prevent any agreement."

Another Fatah official and close aide to Abbas told the Jerusalem Post that the attack was aimed at embarrassing both Abbas and Haniyeh.

"This attack is bad for both of them," he said. "Abbas has been working very hard to reach understandings with Hamas, while Haniyeh does not want an escalation because he wants his government to remain in power."

Abbas was reported by his aides to be furious with Hamas for launching the attack on the IDF post. His office issued a statement condemning the attack as a "violation of the national consensus." The statement noted the attack came just as Fatah and Hamas were about to reach understandings on calming the situation and ending rocket attacks on Israel.

"We have been holding talks in a positive atmosphere to agree on the continuation of the truce and halting all military attacks on Israel because we didn't want to give Israel an excuse to launch a massive military operation into the Gaza Strip," it said.

Economist lauds benefits of Israel stock market

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It's probably too early to tell whether the recent worldwide stock market plunge – which took the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange (TASE) with it – helped or hindered Vered Dar's pitch in favour of investing in Israel.

In one particularly gruesome day, the TA-100, an index of 100 companies listed on the exchange, dropped 1.43 per cent. On the same day, however, the Mexican exchange fell 1.96 per cent, South Africa's main index dropped 3.97 per cent, Brazil's fell 2.11 per cent, Chile's dropped 4.23 per cent and Turkey's 5.67 per cent. Even the exchanges of advanced industrialized nations felt the pain, with Germany's DAX falling1.92 per cent, Britain's FTSE going in the red by 1.80 per cent and Japan's Nikkei index dropping by 4.14 per cent. For comparison sake, Canada's S&P/TSX fell 2.6 per cent and the S&P 500 in New York dropped a mere 1.0 per cent.

Vered Dar

Though negative gains are hardly a selling point, for investors seeking international diversification and discounting the recent sell off – historically good returns, the Israeli stock market could be the place to be, Dar contends. Dar, chief economist and strategist for Psagot Ofek, one of Israel's largest investment houses, visited potential investors in Toronto last week to highlight the advantages of the Israeli stock market.

Historically, the Israeli market has done pretty well, gaining 11 per cent after inflation from 1990 to 2006. "You can't find that return in the United States or Canada," she said.

Even fixed income investments, like government bonds, did better in Israel than their North American counterparts. Shekel-denominated 10-year bonds last week yielded 6.5 per cent compared to 4.3 per cent in Canada, she said, adding that Israel's currency, the shekel, has remained stable over substantial periods, trading at 4.5/4.6 per dollar for the last few years.

Fleshing out her pitch, Dar said Israel's stock market provides the kind of higher returns associated with emerging markets – though not as high as the more successful ones – while avoiding the big drops associated with developing markets during periods of downturn.

Israel, she asserted, straddles the world between truly emerging economies and those that are more developed. Israel's GDP, at roughly $22,000 (US), is about the same as those in Greece and Spain, both EU members. At the same time, Israel displays many of the economic characteristics of advanced industrial states. Inflation is under control (1.6 per cent on average over the last seven years), its deficit is small, its current account (a measure of trade balances) is in surplus and its bank rate is 5.25 per cent, only a quarter of a percentage point over the U.S Fed. Israel, she said, provides investors with "the best of both worlds."

The result of all this good news is that the Israeli economy has been booming and returns to investors in the TASE have been somewhere between what they'd get in the United States or EU and the emerging markets like Russia, Turkey and Brazil. "Israel's economy is now booming. It's at one of its best phases ever.

"If you're looking for somewhere to invest and you see India and Brazil as too dangerous, you'll find Israel right in the middle," she said.

Addressing the question of income distribution and reports that a large number of Israelis have not participated in the boom, Dar acknowledged "the income distribution is not as egalitarian as it was 30 year ago. Income disparity is growing around the world," but Israel's is at around the same level as found in the UK.

The increasing demands of the economy have meant that workers who in the past could make a decent living with only eight to 12 years of education are losing their jobs to lower paid workers in China. "People in Israel are doing well if they have a university degree."

Psagot Ofek, which has been sold to York Capital Management by Bank Leumi, offers investment management accounts for clients with $100,000 (US). Dar expects most potential Canadian clients are people who already have assets in Israel but she points out that others can invest through five tax-exempt Psagot Ofek mutual funds.

Companies considering doing business in Israel will soon have a reconstituted Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce to assist them.

The Chamber, which had been dormant for six years, is being revitalized "to help Israelis and Canadian companies establish business with each other, meaning to help Israeli companies penetrate the Canadian market and vice versa," said Ephraim Shoham, Israel's trade commissioner in Canada.

The new chamber, under the leadership of interim president David Rubin, was launched a few weeks ago in Ottawa and its first objective is to raise enough funds to see it through the next two years until it develops sufficient critical mass among members to make it self-sustaining, he said.

Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce to be reconstituted

Two-way business in trade and services between Canada and Israel today hovers around $1 billion and it has surged close to 50 per cent in the last two years alone, Shoham said.

Trade runs the gamut from consumer products to industrial equipment, including software, environmental technologies, aerospace and security products.

Amdocs, Teva Pharmaceutical, Ormat Technologies, ISCAR and Keter Plastic are among the Israeli companies doing business in Canada while Bombardier, H & R Real Estate, Creo, Nortel and Aecon are among the Canadian companies active in Israel, Shoham said.

Shoham believes business between the two countries has room to grow – by 20 per cent a year if not more.

* * *

Shaj Spetgang is quite familiar with the Israeli business environment, particularly as it relates to environmental issues. As manager of the Ontario Environment Industry Association, which seeks market-driven solutions for environmental problems, and the Canadian Environmental Markets Association, he pointed out member companies of both associations have "looked into doing business in Israel." Zenon, for one, which has been purchased by GE, has offices in Israel to facilitate its work in water treatment.

Foreign firms "recognize Israel as a high-tech place and when an idea is researched in Israel, it's high quality. The technology that comes out of there is first rate."

In addition, Israel is seen as providing access to markets in southeast Asia, Africa and Europe.

On the environmental front, Israel has been at the forefront worldwide in making irrigation more efficient. "The concept of drip irrigation started in Israel and it is being applied all over the world," Spetgang said.

Ormat Technologies,which develops innovative power systems, specializes in heat recovery and generating electricity. It has developed technologies that allow electricity generation from heat as low as 50 degrees centigrade and some of the company's technology has been installed in the TransCanada pipeline, Spetgang said.

The company's technology has also been applied in cement kilns, which must be cooled before restarting. Electricity is generated by the heat given off in the process, Spetgang said.

Israel has signed research agreements with the Canadian government, as well as with the governments of Ontario and Manitoba.

"There is a tremendous amount of innovation coming out of Israel and a tremendous amount of environmental technology that will assist in making the world more sustainable," Spetgang said.

Israel Briefs

Reform shul breaks ground

A Reform congregation near Tel Aviv broke ground on a shul building. Congregation Darchei Noam, with 400 members, began construction June 13 near Herzliya-Ramat Hasharon. The move comes after an 18-year battle to secure land from the local council. Only Orthodox shuls get government funding in Israel. There are 27 Reform congregations in the country.

Israel criticized

Britain, the United Nations and Russia criticized Israel for recent airstrikes in Gaza that have killed civilians. "The killing of innocent civilians, and particularly children, is completely unacceptable," Britain's foreign secretary, Margaret Beckett, said. UN official Ibrahim Gambari gave a similar quote, while Russia's foreign ministry released a statement acknowledging Israel's security concerns, but saying the "use of force against the civilian population is unacceptable." Israeli Defence Minister Amir Peretz has ordered an inquiry into missile misfires.

800 new millionaires

Some 800 Israelis became millionaires in 2005. Ha'aretz reported that Merrill Lynch in Israel issued a report that the number of millionaires in Israel increased by 12 per cent, to 7,484, compared to a global increase of 6.5 per cent.

Conceived in comedy

An Israeli hospital has pioneered the use of humour to improve the rate of in-vitro fertilization. Dr. Shevach Friedler of Assaf Harofeh Medical Center presented findings at a conference in Prague suggesting that efforts to artificially impregnate a woman are considerably more successful if she is amused. Friedler cited an experiment at Assaf Harofeh's fertility clinic, in which 93 patients were entertained by a clown during their procedure, and the same number were not. Thirty-three women in the first group conceived, compared to only 18 in the second group.

Artist Lewis Lavoie, in background, and his business partner Phil Alain (not mentioned in the story) show how the mural will come together.

After thousands of years of persecution culminating in the Shoah, the world has come to view the Jewish people as the eternal victim and only on occasion a survivor.

Simon Wiesenthal, after surviving 12 concentration camps, spent the next 60 years hunting Nazis and writing books, such as The Sunflower, which became widely used in courses about the Holocaust.

Elie Wiesel, after surviving four concentration camps, imposed upon himself a 10-year silence from which he emerged by writing his first work, Night. As it was one of the first books on the Holocaust, it took Wiesel five years to find a publisher because they felt it was simply too horrible to read. He went on to write 40 more books about the Holocaust, eventually winning the Nobel Peace Prize in 1986.

The survivor Primo Levi wrote Survival in Auschwitz. Anne Frank dreamed of becoming a writer while hiding in the attic. Not surviving to see her 16th birthday, she has emerged as one of the most powerful voices of the Holocaust through The Diary of a Young Girl.

Weisethal, Wiesel and Levi are not just survivors. Along with Frank, their stories have put the Holocaust in the history books.

So to find symbols and stories that speak of the Jewish people as fighters and victors is liberating.

David Bercuson has embarked on such a journey as the head of a project to bring awareness to the idea of Jews as fighters and victors – the Art Gallery in Honour of Jewish Canadian War Veterans in Calgary. Bercuson has helped raise $375,000 for the gallery so far, with a target of $2 million.

The legacy project is part of the larger $16-million expansion of the Museum of the Regiments in Calgary.

Currently, the Museum of the Regiments honours the army branch of military service, while the Naval Museum of Alberta is housed separately, off 24th Street West, and the Air Force Museum is close to the airport. The expansion project will bring all three branches of the military under a single roof and will also house the Art Gallery in Honour of Jewish Canadian War Veterans, which will display Canada's war art collection and honour Jewish war veterans.

Canada's war art collection was the brainchild of Lord Beaverbrook, who, during World War I, decided to send some of Canada's best artists, some of whom later became members of the Group of Seven, to Europe to document the Canadian war effort. The project continued in World War II, resulting in the creation of 13,000 pieces of war art. The works, however, were never displayed in a gallery. For 60 years, they collected dust in the basement of the Canadian War Museum in Ottawa.

The Art Gallery in Honour of Jewish Canadian War Veterans will be the permanent home, on a rotating basis, with the Canadian War Museum in Ottawa, of the vast Lord Beaverbrook military art collection. It will also feature a permanent display honouring Jewish Canadian war veterans' contributions to the two world wars.

Bercuson, the director of the Centre of Military and Strategic Studies at the University of Calgary, says he got involved with the Jewish Canadian War Veterans gallery because "Canadian Jews made a substantial contribution to the war effort during the Second World War. Whenever World War II is thought of, we are depicted as and we think of ourselves as victims, when there were millions of us all over the world fighting in various Allied countries to defeat the Nazis."

He acknowledges that, yes, European Jewry were catastrophic victims, "But there were others who were fighting back."

Bercuson believes it is not good to be remembered only for victimhood. "It's very, very important for the non-Jewish community to know what Jews did to contribute to the greater good. It shows them that, among the many things that we have done as citizens of this country over the last 200 to 300 years, that was one of our finest moments. We are full citizens here because we earned it."

Bercuson has raised funds from a relatively small number of generous Jewish families. The largest contribution thus far, of $100,000, was made by the Martin family of Calgary.

Other opportunities to contribute to the Museum of the Regiments exist, as well. The museum will be the home of a 12-by-20- foot "Year of the Veteran" Mural Mosaic, which through optical illusion, from afar, will depict a member of the army, the air force and the navy. Approaching the Mural Mosaic closer, the viewer will be able to see it is made up of separate 12-by-12-inch panels depicting individual stories.

The Mural Mosaic is non-denominational and is open to everyone in the community at different levels of sponsorship.

Currently being painted by artist Lewis Lavoie in Edmonton, the Mural Mosaic will be toured across the country once it's finished and displayed temporarily at the Canadian War Museum in Ottawa.

Once the museum expansion project is completed, at a yet unnamed date, the Jewish community will have a voice in telling their story to the greater community.

COMIC DUO TO STAGE PLAY IN HONEST ED'S LOADING DOCK

Sandy Gribbin and Adam Lazarus attempt a new definition of street theatre with Suit Suite, their motivational seminar-musical to be staged at Honest Ed Mirvish's loading dock, 581 Bloor St. W., in the alley between Bathurst and Markham streets.

Suit Suite focuses on "two fun-lovin', suit-wearin', song-singin' gents who have found the rules to success, fulfilment and happiness" and whose high-octane physical comedy, vaudeville and music will supposedly revive the audience's "power to laugh, marvel and enjoy." Admission to this Fringe Festival offering is $10, nightly from July 6 to 16, 7:30 p.m. No latecomers please.

* * *

Fringe Too: Toronto native Tracey Erin Smith brings her show The Burning Bush! for a return engagement in Toronto after performances in New York, Vancouver and Edmonton. Directed by Rebecca Northan, the Fringe offering is a one-woman comedy about a dejected rabbinical school dropout who stumbles into a strip club and discovers her true calling.
Royal St. George's College, Music Recital Hall, 120 Howland Ave. $10. July 5 to 16. 416-966-1062, www.fringetoronto.com

Fringe Three: Libby Skala presents her new solo show, A Time to Dance, using creative dance and spoken word to tell the story of her great-aunt, Lisl, who was born in Vienna in 1902 and lived to survive two world wars as well as 9/11. $10. Royal St. George Theatre, July 5 to 16. 416-966-1062. www.aTimetoDance. homestead.com

Jewish-Themed Theatre: Ari Weisberg, artistic director of Teatron Theatre, has announced that Teatron will stage two award-winning comedies for its upcoming fourth season.

The Last Night of Ballyhoo, by Alfred Uhry, is a bittersweet comedy set in Atlanta during the Christmas of 1939, as Hitler is invading Poland. Atlanta's elitist German Jews, however, are more concerned with finding the best dates and dresses for Ballyhoo, the social event of the season. (Uhry is the much-lauded author of the popular play and movie Driving Miss Daisy.)

Teatron's second choice is The God of Isaac, by James Sherman, a "funny and heartwarming" story about a young man in search of spiritual identity.

As the only theatre company in Ontario dedicated to producing Jewish-themed plays, Teatron deserves our support. "There are many good plays to choose from, but we look for plays that have a true Jewish content, bringing a specific Jewish topic to the stage," Weisberg said. "This year, we chose two excellent comedies. They are funny and fast moving, but still have strong content to them and are not just a bunch of one-liners."

Both are directed by Weisberg and staged at the Leah Posluns Theatre. The Last Night of Ballyhoo opens in January 2007, The God of Isaac in March 2007.

Teatron is seeking volunteers as well as sponsors and donors. www.teatrontheatre.com, e-mail teatron@sympatico.ca, phone 416-781-5527

Names in the News: Emmy Award-winning producer Marta Kauffman, best known as the co-creator and executive producer of the TV series Friends, joins director Roberta Grossman and the non-profit Katahdin Foundation in producing Blessed Is the Match: The Life and Death of Hannah Senesh, a feature documentary on the World War II-era poet and diarist who became a soldier, martyr and national heroine in Israel.

The proposed doc explores the life and death of Senesh, the young writer in 1943 Palestine who volunteered for a mission to rescue Jews in her native Hungary. In 1944, Senesh parachuted behind enemy lines, was captured, imprisoned and ultimately executed by the Nazis.

In a cruel twist of fate, her mother witnessed the entire ordeal – first as a prisoner with Hannah and later as her advocate as she desperately attempted to save her. At its core, Senesh's story "is an intense and moving mother-daughter story," Kauffman said.

The producers have been granted unprecedented access to the Senesh family archive, including hundreds of unpublished letters and about 1,300 never-before-seen photos of remarkable quality. Filming is expected to be completed in Israel and Hungary this fall, with theatrical release and public television broadcast planned for early 2008.

Documentary about Leonard Cohen lacks a clear focus

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Songwriter and poet Leonard Cohen is known far and wide. At 72, the soulful Montreal-born troubadour has a reputation that transcends borders and nationalities.

So it hardly comes as a surprise that Lian Lunson's film about him, Leonard Cohen: I'm Your Man, which opens in Toronto on June 30, is set in the Sydney Opera House in Australia.

It is indeed true that Cohen, who has lived in Los Angeles for many years now, has an international following.

Lunson's documentary, which premièred at last year's Toronto International Film Festival, is a disjointed amalgam of concert footage, flashbacks from his youth and interviews with performers he has influenced.

Among them are the McGarrigle sisters, The Edge and Nick Cave.

The movie has no clear focus when one is really needed. One wishes that Lunson had concentrated on the trajectory of his career rather than running off in all directions and diluting the narrative.

Still, Leonard Cohen: I'm Your Man is not uninteresting.

Cohen emerges as a modest, personable, witty, self-deprecating, grounded person. Fame has not gone to his head, or if it has, he masks it effortlessly.

In only one instance does he blow his own horn, and that occurs when he correctly observes that his writing talents are definitely an advantage to a songwriter like himself.

Even so, he concedes, nothing comes easy. He constantly rewrites and is not satisfied until he has produced at least 10 versions of a song.

Cohen speaks openly of his spiritual quest. As a child, he was drawn to the synagogue his family frequented. And much later, he spent years in a mountain-top Buddhist monastery in California.

Looking back at a formative phase of his life, Cohen recalls his association with such stellar Montreal poets as Louis Dudek, Frank Scott and Irving Layton (whose funeral he recently attended).

Leonard Cohen, left, with director Lian Lunson and Bono

"We really wanted to be great poets," he says.

Commenting on his proclivity for the company of women, Cohen facetiously says that he started writing poetry to attract the opposite sex.

But he strikes a more serious note when he remarks that his image as a ladies' man is "a joke." As he puts it, "I laughed about it for the 10,000 nights I spent alone in the monastery."

Turning to his body of songs, from Everybody Knows to Sisters of Mercy, Cohen explains that a lot of them evolved as a response to his ceaseless search for truth and beauty.

His admirers recognize this quality.

Bono, one of the participants in the Sydney concert that bookends the film, has high praise for Cohen.

Describing him as a craftsman, he says in an Irish lilt, "I've been humbled as a fan of Leonard Cohen. He's our Byron, he's our Shelley."

Rufus Wainwright offers an amusing vignette. When he first met him, Cohen, clad in his underwear, was boiling soba noodles in his kitchen.

Normally a snappy dresser, Cohen did not want to be remembered that way. So he repaired to his bedroom and magically reappeared in an alluring Armani suit.

Although Wainwright's reminiscence is useful and fun, the film would surely have been infinitely more effective had it concentrated on Cohen's development as a poet/songwriter.

Chalk it up as an opportunity lost.

Producers seek Canadian input for film on 1967 war

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — On June 5, 1967, when news of Israel's second existential war made a sense of dread rise up in your belly, what did you do?

Did you catch the next flight to Israel to volunteer? Did you help spur the Jewish community to action? Did you raise money? Did the news revive a dormant Jewishness or Zionism in you that you didn't even know was there?

Did you keep a diary, write letters, take pictures, or shoot home movies of family discussions about the war or about the euphoria that many of us felt six days later?

Montreal filmmaker Ina Fichman is looking for answers to these questions.

Fichman's company, Instinct Films, is one of three – the others are Israel's Alma Films and France's Point du Jour – working on an ambitious, and what she hopes will be a definitive and groundbreaking, documentary about the Six Day War.

Inspired by Michael Oren's book Six Days of War, the film is titled Six Days in June: The 1967 War and the Making of the Modern Middle East. It's set for broadcast and theatrical release in North America, Europe and Israel next June, to coincide with the war's 40th anniversary.

The director is Ilan Ziv, a respected and award-winning documentary filmmaker whose credits include The Junction and Human Weapon, an acclaimed study on suicide bombing.

The June 2007 release date, Fichman said in an interview, is why the search is now on – mostly in Montreal and Toronto – for Canadians who were "profoundly touched" by the war.

She said the film is unprecedented in scope, and she hopes Canadians will furnish vital input on how the Six Day War affected them personally, and galvanized them into action.

Similar searches are on in France, Israel and the Arab countries involved in the war – Egypt, Jordan, and Syria. Interviews will be conducted with both average people and military veterans of the war in order to capture the historical, political and military drama unfolding in the hearts and minds of people as they lived through the conflict.

The producers are also especially interested in obtaining visuals from the six-day period – home movies, photographs and the like – that are relevant to the drama. Fichman said an example might be an old home movie shot of the Israeli Pavilion at Expo '67.

"What we're really looking for are the best stories that will explain and explore the impact this war had on so many people," she said.

"This is a story with a very strong narrative, but it will not be a film quoting historians, journalists, or specialists," Fichman added. "This will be about what these six days meant to the world."

She said shooting in Montreal is expected to begin by the end of the summer. The film has a $1.7-million budget, with funding coming from international broadcasters, Canadian tax credits and distributor advances.

On television, the film will be shown in two 50-minute segments (one hour with commercials), while the theatrical release will run 90 minutes. Already confirmed to air the film are Radio Canada; WGBH, a PBS affiliate in Boston: France's ARTE network; Israel's channel 10; ABC in Australia, and Italy's RAI.

Fichman's own credits as a producer include 2003's Undying Love, which earned her a Gemini Award, and the youth documentary series My Brand New Life.

Ideally, the finished product will be "analytical, personal, and anecdotal," and perhaps even "poetic" in its sensibility, she said.

"We plan this to be landmark film."

People who feel they have something to contribute to Six Days in June can contact Terri Foxman, at 514-288-0369. Her e-mail address is tfoxman@sympatico.ca.

Three new DVDs offer stories of Jewish interest

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

There are several Jewish-themed movies now out on DVD that will likely interest a lot of people.

Everything Is Illuminated is a multi-layered film that is both entertaining and intellectually stimulating. Liev Schreiber's brilliant script pares down the elements of Jonathan Safran Foer's popular novel into a filmable format.

The film deals with an odyssey of sorts. The main character is Jonathan Safran Foer, played by Elijah Wood, and the story chronicles his trip to Ukraine to track down his family's roots.

He is a collector who gathers and preserves his family's history, and one of his most cherished possessions is a photograph of his grandfather as a young man with a girl at his side. The grandfather had always credited this girl with saving him from sharing the same fate as most Jews in Ukraine during the Holocaust.

Jonathan goes to Ukraine to see what, if anything, remains of his grandfather's past. Once there, he hires a guide and interpreter, who becomes the comedic heart of the film.

The result is a wonderful film adventure for all viewers, and a comedy that ultimately turns very serious.

A second film that was recently released on DVD is The Squid and the Whale, in which director Noah Baumback tells the autobiographical story of his parents' divorce.

Both of his parents are intellectuals and academics, but this doesn't make their parting of ways any easier. At the same time, the couple's two children have to try to deal with adolescent angst while their lives are falling apart around them.

The other DVD I'd like to bring to your attention is Austeria, a Polish film from 1988 that's set during the opening days of World War I.

A group of Jews is fleeing from Cossack soldiers in Polish Galicia and are trapped overnight in an inn near the border. They find themselves living with soldiers, the innkeeper and his family, and friends. This interesting film, in Polish, is about a period in history that few of us know anything about. And it's a story worth telling.

As is so often the case with smaller studio releases and independent or foreign films, some of these DVD releases may be hard to find. Everything Is Illuminated and The Squid and the Whale should be available at most good video stores, but Austeria may require a special order, or you may have to buy it online from Amazon at www.amazon.ca.

When 'the pride of the ghetto' meant fancy footwork

Barney Ross* by Douglas Century, Nextbook.

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

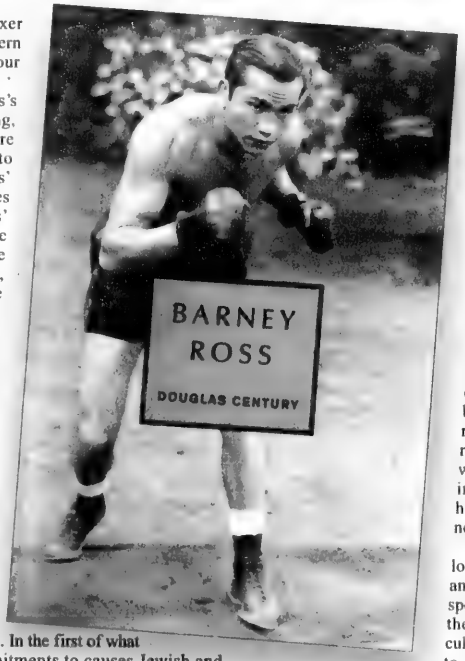
Douglas Century's biography of Chicago-raised boxer Barney Ross is a lively study of the place of "ethnics" – in particular Jews – in American sport. Ross, a star lightweight and welterweight through the 1930s, was part of a generation of Jewish boxers who went up against their Irish and Italian counterparts, while promoters and fans flew the flag of ethnic pride. Century characterizes this rivalry as an early form of public relations hype that embarrassed many boxers, though it gave the "sweet science" something the immigrant class in pre-World War II America could rally around. When Ross battled Jimmy (The Babyfaced Assassin) McLarnin, the latter came through the ropes to an Irish jig, while Ross was serenaded into the ring by My Yiddishe Momme.

Norman Ravvin

Barney Ross begins in a surprising place and time – on the soccer field of a "small Yiddish elementary school in the foothills of the Canadian Rocky Mountains." There, in the mid-'70s, the school's principal, himself a youthful partisan during the war, "loved to talk about the rich history of Jewish athletics. I recall our lehrer telling me about the champion boxer and World War II hero Barney Ross," Century writes. "He had once met Ross, then late in life, when the white-haired boxer was travelling through western Canada on a fundraising tour for State of Israel Bonds."

Century describes Ross's meteoric success in the ring, making excellent use of wire reports and film footage to recover a sense of the fights' kinetic qualities. He devotes careful attention to Ross' career-ending loss of the World Welterweight prize fight in the spring of 1938, which precipitated a decline into celebrity aimlessness. Throughout his rise and fall, Ross was an almost farcically bad bettor at the horse track. After winning a fight purse as large as $18,000, he would travel to the track and lose the entire sum "in a few hours, betting wrong on eight races out of eight."

In an effort to make sense of his post-boxing life, Ross joined the marines and shipped overseas to a much-decorated term of soldiering in the Pacific at Guadalcanal. In the first of what would be a series of commitments to causes Jewish and not, Ross applied himself, upon returning to the United States, to travelling the country for public appearances in support of the troops.



Many biographies of celebrities are written in order to please the subject's fans, simply to trade on the easy publicity that attaches itself to a champion or matinee idol. Century's book is something else. It aims to tell Ross's story, not for titillation, but rather to mine it for a tangle of key themes in American culture. He is deft at portraying Chicago's Maxwell Street ghetto, a breeding ground for sharpies, nightclubbers and mobsters. He is subtle, never sentimental, in his depiction of how Ross's Orthodox upbringing continued to play a role in his career. And he finesses the difficult theme – which is an underlying current in much modern Jewish history – of "Jewish toughness."

Century acknowledges a longstanding Jewish tendency among observant Jews to view sport as "inextricably linked to the threat of a foreign, pagan culture." But as a counterweight to this, Barney Ross offers a portrait of a moment in America, in the 1920s and '30s, when "Jews were the dominant nationality in professional prizefighting, followed by the Italians and Irish." It was an era of outlandishly named Jewish toughs – Battling Levinsky, Slapsie Maxie Rosenbloom, and the heavyweight Kingfish Levinsky, of whom an intimate recalls that the "King was always missing a day of the week." To convey the impact this had on Jewish identity, Century quotes from Philip Roth's autobiographical book The Facts. "In my scheme of things," Roth writes, "Slapsie Maxie was a more remarkable Jewish phenomenon by far than Dr. Albert Einstein."

And then, almost overnight, it was over. "To drive through Chicago today," Century tells us, "one might think that the world of Barney Ross's youth had been some kind of mirage, a riotous dream of Jewish gunmen and bookmakers, fighting garment workers and smashed-nose boxers… There are practically no tales of second-generation Jewish fighters, just as few Jews followed their gangster fathers into the criminal milieu."

Century's family has roots in the Chicago neighbourhoods where Ross and his compatriots grew up, so there is a personal side to his tenacious search after what he calls "long-vanished images of Jewish toughness." In a fine literary turn, he links this search with his own upbringing near the foothills of the Canadian Rockies. And he delves further into his family's past in the final pages of Barney Ross, where he describes his interviews with Ross's surviving brother in an apartment packed with memorabilia and news clippings, preserved out of brotherly respect but largely forgotten. Century recognizes that Ross is no longer a Chicago celebrity, having been replaced by Walter Payton, Dick Butkus, Michael Jordan and the Ontario-born Bobby Hull.

For readers willing to think about sports in ways that go beyond statistics and astronomical payouts, Barney Ross is a welcome surprise.

Toronto couple still going strong after 80 years

Aurelia and Lewis Friedlich met by chance 80 years ago on a boat from Vienna to Budapest. It was love at first sight, and they married soon after. The couple, who live at Baycrest's Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged, were honoured by their family at a special party on June 20. Aurelia is 99 and Lewis is 105. A CBC documentary crew was on hand to film the occasion as part of an upcoming series on marriage. At bottom, right, is the couple's wedding photo.

About Nutrition

By Lisa Weinberg

Q. I have been hearing a lot lately about probiotics. What are they, and should I be eating them?

A. I am glad you asked this question because there is a lot of buzz around probiotics at the moment, as well as some interesting products containing it. Probiotics are good bacteria. They are naturally found in our intestines, and we need them to maintain good intestinal health. These good bacteria often get depleted over time as a result of stress, aging, antibiotic use, stomach bugs and some gastrointestinal diseases. We live in a time when we have become phobic about bacteria, but these are some you should welcome into your body.

I have seen incredible improvement in symptoms and reduced pain in many people in my practice, and even with my own husband, once they have added probiotics to their diet. We can all benefit from including these in our diets, but I have seen especially impressive improvements in people with IBS, irritable bowel syndrome.

So, where can you get probiotics? Well, you can take them in supplement form, you can get them from some yogurts and kefir that have had probiotics added to them, and they have been added to a new Canadian fruit beverage. You can find all of these in the refrigerator section of your grocery store. All you need is one cup of the drink or ¼ cup of yogurt to get the approximately one billion active bacteria that you want per serving.

Q. Now that melon season is here, I am wondering about something. I have heard that melons should be washed before we cut them. Is this true, and if so, why, and what is the best way to wash them?

A. This is actually both true and a very good idea. Many melons, such as watermelon and cantaloupe, grow right on the ground and are therefore often exposed to manures and other growing aids that get directly on the skin and can carry bacteria. So, to be safe, it is a good idea to wash the outside before drawing a knife from the potentially dirty exterior through the clean interior. The best way to do this is with warm soapy water. While I wouldn't recommend using soap with other fruits where we eat the skin, it is useful here. Squirt on a little dish soap, lather it up with some warm water, rinse, dry, slice and enjoy!

ROGER WATERS DRAWS 50,000

An estimated 50,000 people converged on the mixed Arab-Jewish town of Neveh Shalom to listen to a concert by the British rock singer, Roger Waters, founder of the group Pink Floyd. All roads leading to Neveh Shalom, located midway between Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, were in complete gridlock as fans, young and old, converged on the town from all over Israel. Towards the end of his concert he told his audience that "Israelis should tear down the walls and make peace with their neighbours." This comment received loud applause.

NBA scouts considering three Jewish prospects

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Call it a dearth, scarcity, or paucity, but of all North American pro sports, basketball is the one game that has a deficiency of Jewish players. In fact, there is not a single member of the chosen people who is today toiling in the NBA.

Now that is not to say that the Jewish people didn't have the hoops habit. In fact, they did, dating back to 1891 when the game was invented in the United States.

Today, as in the past, they are well represented at the U.S. collegiate level, but only a relative few have taken that rare giant step into the pros.

Dan Grunfeld

In days of yore, of course, there were the likes of Hall of Famer Adolph Schayes and his son Dan, Max Zaslofsky, Neil Walk, Nat Holman, Barry and Joel Kramer, Ernie Grunfeld, Art Heyman and the greatest of the early pros, Barney Sedran (Sedransky).

Now what box office minded general manager today, in cities with sizable Jewish populations, such as Minneapolis, Toronto, New York, Los Angeles or Chicago wouldn't mind acquiring the services of a talent of the Jewish persuasion?

Well, it just so happens that the NBA amateur draft will be taking place in the Big Apple on June 28th and a few of the talent scouts are touting a trio of Jewish kids who might be deemed worthy of being swept up in the draft.

Yotam Halperin

First, in the category of "like father, like son," very available is none other than Dan Grunfeld, the offspring of the aforementioned Ernie Grunfeld. A senior at Stanford University with the Cardinals, he is a 6-6 guard who has yearned to follow in dad's footsteps since he was still in his early elementary school years.

From all reports, the kid's game is practically identical to that of his dad who starred at the University of Tennessee and had a productive nine-year NBA career with the Milwaukee Bucks, Kansas City Kings, and the New York Knicks.

According to reports, Grunfeld can drive to the basket and is an excellent passer. His knowledge of the game is superior to most, due to his having grown up in a basketball environment. Education was stressed in his home; consequently he sports a 3.67 grade point average at school.

His final season at Stanford was a good news-bad news story. The all-academic guard, who weighs 220 lbs., started 29 of 30 games, averaging 12 points, and five rebounds. In the latter part of the schedule however, Grunfeld tore the anterior cruciate ligament in his right knee on a fast break in a game against UCLA. His rehab has gone very well and the kid's health is not considered to be a detriment.

Grunfeld, who honed his skills as a youth playing one-on-one on the driveway with his dad, may one day play for pop. The latter is now president of basketball operations for the Washington Wizards and has several times responded positively to the query as to whether he might want to choose his 22-year-old son in the draft.

Another legitimate prospect to watch for is Yotam Halperin, a 6-5, 200-lb. point guard whose hometown is Ranana, Israel and who plays internationally with Union Olimpija Ljubljana, International.

Halperin joined Maccabi Tel Aviv's youth system when he was just eight years old and was considered a future star, even being touted as Israel's first-ever NBA player. He played for four seasons with Maccabi Tel Aviv and won four Israeli championships, four Israeli national cups and two Euroleague titles.

As with all aspiring young players he has both an upside and a downside.

He has a prototype NBA body and a good wingspan. Halperin is a slasher with a very good jump shot and is reputed to be able to score from anywhere on the floor. His foul shooting is an impressive 90 per cent.

Halperin, 22, comes up short as a defensive player due to a lack of lateral quickness. He is just an average playmaker who cannot control the tempo of a game. Still it is believed that he might make the grade as a backup at the NBA level.

The outlook is that he is a very strong second round prospect – there are only two rounds in the NBA draft – and could perhaps be taken late in the first round.

Perhaps, if our third prospect is drafted, the NBA door may open for Lior Eliyahu, a 20-year-old who was raised in Ramat Gan, Israel and plays for Galil Elyon, International.

The six-foot-eight, 210-lb. power forward is listed as having "an excellent wingspan and big hands." He is very athletic with good quickness and is described by one scout, Jonathan Givony, as "smart and slithery around the basket."

Because most of his offence comes from the 15-foot range, he has an impressive shooting percentage of 58 per cent. Lior averaged 16 points in 29 games. He possesses a high basketball IQ, good footwork, and a soft touch. In addition to long arms, another asset is his quick first step and long strides that serve him well in getting to the basket.

On the downside, his foul shooting average is only 67 per cent and he needs to improve his ball-handling skills, especially with his left hand, or the directions he heads will be too predictable to the competition. Another drawback is his play on defence due to poor lateral footwork. A lack of strength dictates that he will have to bulk up if he hopes to play with the larger lads under the big top in North America.

Lior Eliyahu

A member of the under-21 Israeli National Team, Eliyahu was voted Youth Player of the Year in 2002/03 and is currently serving a mandatory three-year stint in the Israeli army that may temporarily postpone his aspirations of a NBA career another year.

Time for a rebound, don't you think? Will it be Grunfeld, Halperin, or Eliyahu who is to be the first Jewish stalwart in the NBA since Dan Schayes retired in 1999 following 18 years under the big top?

Ghana apologizes for Israeli flag-waving

JTA

ACCRA, Ghana — Ghana apologized after one of its soccer players waved an Israeli flag at the World Cup earlier this month.

John Pantsil's gesture during a weekend game against the Czech Republic was aimed at solidarity with the Hapoel Tel Aviv soccer team, which he usually plays for, but it raised eyebrows among Arabs.

A Ghana Football Association spokesperson apologized June 19 and said Pantsil had been cautioned.

"He is obviously unaware of the implications of what he did. He's unaware of the international politics. We apologize to anybody who was offended and we promise that it will never happen again," the spokesman said. "He did not act out of malice for the Arab people or in support of Israel. He was naive."

FIFA, the organization overseeing the World Cup in Germany, said it had no problem with Pantsil's gesture.

A change in musical tone

By YONI GOLDSTEIN

Jewish music, once a staid and uninventive genre, is undergoing a major facelift. Traditionally steeped in, well, tradition, Jewish music has never been particularly inspiring to music enthusiasts because, for the most part, it has always lacked creativity and a desire to grow in new musical directions.

New Views

Now, all that's changing– and people are starting to notice.

Most of the hype surrounding Jewish music has to do with Matisyahu. The New York-based chassidic reggae artist has exploded onto the popular music scene over the past year, releasing two albums (Live at Stubb's and Youth) and receiving extensive airplay on radio and MTV. He is currently touring North America with the internationally renowned Dave Matthews Band, and he was recently among the top five most downloaded artists on Apple's iTunes music store. Mainstream success notwithstanding, Matisyahu is clearly a Jewish artist more than anything else. If the recitation of the Shema and his cantorial tendencies don't make that clear, his swaying tzitzit and mangled black hat surely give him away.

Matisyahu aside, though, other bands are also making Jewish waves in pop music. The Shondes, a group that is three-quarters Jewish, recently made the pages of the Village Voice, the granddaddy of alternative weeklies. The Brooklyn-based quartet is composed of three transgendered Jews and a fourth member whom the other three call – apparently lovingly – their "shiksa." The group's name, which stems from the Yiddish word for "disgrace," is a conscious decision to stand on the fringe of accepted Jewish identity. The Shondes lay out an ideology that speaks loudly against what they refer to as Jewish nationalism and Jewish heterosexuality – they want to create a Jewishness that works on their terms.

Actor George Segal is even taking a run at the music business as the founding member of Chutzpah, the self-proclaimed "First Ever Jewish Hip Hop Supergroup," though he'll never admit to it. The Chutzpah trio – Master Tav, MC Meshugenah and Jewdah – have had a busy year, releasing an album titled Eponymous and touring across the U.S. Songs such as Chanukah's Da Bomb and Da Lost Tribe emphasize that Chutzpah is out to get laughs, but that hasn't stopped mainstream crowds from taking note. The group has appeared on FOX television and EXTRA!, and Chutzpah, This Is, a mockumentary chronicling the career of the trio and Dr. Dreck (aka Segal), Chutzpah's magisterial founder, premiered at the HBO Comedy Arts Festival in Aspen, Colo.

There are others as well, including Blue Fringe, a group of Yeshiva University grads that projects a pop music sensibility better than any other Jewish group and has spawned half a dozen imitators over the past few years. Other new performers and groups are springing up at an astonishing pace.

The real question going forward will not be whether Jewish music can find its way into the mainstream – the past year has proven that a Jewish music revolution has already begun – but what audiences will be willing to count as part of the Jewish music genre. Will Hebrew lyrics and quotes from the siddur continue as necessary standards, or will less obvious references to Jewish tradition be acceptable? Does Jewish music always have to be celebratory of our heritage or are we willing to accept performers that question our shared history? Jewish audiences will have to decide.

Whatever those decisions be, we are on the cusp of an entirely new Jewish music. The days of a genre full of Carelebach copies and singers concerned with performance rather than craft are done. The new generation is determined to create honest music that gathers influence from both Jewish tradition and an eclectic musical set – musicianship, composition and religion are equally important to these performers. And we, the listeners, have the exciting prospect of a new musical wave to look forward to.

Once newborns

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Today was a difficult day. I came face to face with the suffering of a Jewish mother whose son has run away, and with a traditional Jew, about my age, who has been chronically depressed since he was little and is now living in a shelter.

URBAN WRITER

I forced myself to concentrate on every word they uttered, hoping to give them the respect and attentiveness they likely crave, yet rarely get. After awhile, it's hard to listen to someone who is depressed, perhaps because caring in excess is a burden that takes away from our struggle for joy, and because their depression frightens us, since their sadness reminds us of our own.

Yet, when I spoke to the man, my mind wandered, and I began to think about how I should be thinking. I was monitoring myself, watching myself, determining what the "right" way of responding would be, rather than doing what comes naturally.

Then an image of my son, Noah, only nine weeks old, appeared to me. When it did, I looked at this desperate, traditional Jew sitting opposite me and realized that he was once a little boy with a mamma and papa, and somewhere along the road, he ended up without them.

And tonight, this man who was once a child will sleep among other "orphaned" men, cut off from that parental love, having to find ways of protecting themselves from others who are like them.

My little Noah weighs 12 pounds and is swaddled in layers of emotional defence against goblins and men. This traditional Jew was leaning on a wall in a laneway, consortung with ghosts.

"My boy ran away from home with nothing," the woman agonized. She expressed the pain that Jacob felt upon losing his son Joseph. The sages say there is no greater parental pain than not knowing if one's child is alive or dead. If the child is alive, we celebrate. If the child is dead, we mourn. Not knowing, however, gives us no time for peace.

"I haven't heard from him since he ran away," the woman said. My God, this is the child for whom she would have lifted a car with her bare hands in order to save him. Her desperation and despair cause her layers of grief that are only understandable to those who have done more than just imagined this horror.

And my heavenly secret, Noah, smiles for the very first time.

Can we mend this suffering? Are we able to repair everything if we only try, or are there things that are meant to be in a state of disrepair? Is imperfection a part of life?

If we are aggressively introspective, we become more aware of the anger that we project on others, and of familial dysfunctionality that we pass on to our children.

But is it not possible to create a healthier world? Do Miriam and I know for sure that Noah will never run away from us?

My Noah is crying. He will not sleep. Miriam has slipped into his vivid yellow room to caress his tummy and lightly massage his cheeks. I listen to his shrill cries as they evolve into the cooing and bubbling sounds of sleep.

My little boy is safe in his crib, separated from us by a thin door. His two nervous and adoring parents are ready to fight off the unpredictable army of fright that might try to enter his room while he slumbers. I want to keep him there forever and ever.

I know, however, that this Jewish mother wanted the same for her boy.

"Where is my son?" she asks.

God bring him home soon, for the mother and father who once held him in their arms and are tortured with despair.

Noah, sleep in my arms while you still can, for childhood is but a day.

Gaza may portend Lebanese rules of war

By HERB KEINON
Jerusalem Post

The events of the last few weeks in and around Gaza – the rocket fire on Sderot, the roadside explosions, the Israeli air raids, the "collateral damage," the capture of an Israeli soldier, the captors' psychological warfare – all lead to one sinking, unmistakable feeling: Lebanon is here.

The similarities between what is happening now in Gaza, less than one year after disengagement, and what happened for some 18 years in Lebanon are frightening. Yet it should come as no surprise - Hamas learned well from Hezbollah.

If the Palestinians from Gaza shoot rockets on Israel as though they were in Lebanon, if they plant roadside bombs as though they were in Lebanon, if they attack Israel Defence Forces outposts and kidnap soldiers as though they were in Lebanon, then they should not be too surprised when Israel treats the Palestinian Authority like Lebanon and acts accordingly.

Which is what the IDF did June 28 by driving into Gaza, knocking out electricity and knocking down three bridges.

Analysis

Hezbollah has thousands of rockets along the border with Israel, and its outposts are directly on the border facing IDF outposts, yet since Israel's withdrawal from Lebanon six years ago, a tense quiet has reigned in the north.

It's not as if Hezbollah is uninterested in making our lives miserable, but rather that Israel has simply – through military action and clear diplomatic messages over the last six years – made it clear that, if Israel gets hit by Hezbollah, Lebanon and the Lebanese will pay the price.

Now that Hezbollah is part of the Lebanese political process, this is not a price the organization/political party wants to pay, because it is concerned that if the Lebanese suffer Hezbollah will be blamed. The result, if not exactly mutual assured destruction (MAD) – the doctrine that governed Russian-U.S relations during the Cold War – is what could be called a balance of mutual threats.

Hezbollah doesn't attack Israel, or at least not much, because it knows Israel can wreak devastation on southern Lebanon and that the Lebanese will then hold Hezbollah accountable. Israel's activities in Gaza seem designed to create a similar situation in Gaza. But there may be one big difference. Whereas Hezbollah is concerned that a devastating IDF blow in Lebanon could hurt its political standing, this may not be the case in Gaza.

United Church supports Israel boycott

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A motion passed last week by the Toronto Conference of the United Church of Canada supporting an Ontario labour union's recent decision to boycott Israel has been strongly denounced by mainstream Jewish organizations.

Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, described it as "unjust and misguided," while B'nai Brith called it anti-Israel.

Rick McKinley, the newly elected president of the Toronto Conference, said he personally disagrees with the motion and feels the church should be supportive of Israel. "But the motion is not anti-Israel and was not intended to be," he insisted.

Jewish groups denounce motion by Toronto branch

Frances Combs, co-chair of a United Church task group that touched off the current controversy by endorsing a resolution passed by the Ontario wing of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) backing economic sanctions against Israel until it recognizes "the Palestinian right to self-determination," also denied the motion is anti-Israel.

Claiming that it was not aimed at Israel but at Israel's "illegal" occupation of the West Bank and east Jerusalem, she declared, "We're not boycotting Israel. We're boycotting the occupation."

Author Up For Prize

MONTREAL — Montreal writer B. Glen Rotchin, author of The Rent Collector, is a finalist for the 29th annual First Novel Award, a prestigious Canadian literary award that recognizes first-time novelists. Set in Montreal's garment industry, the book focuses on a gentle Orthodox family man who reluctantly manages his father's large building on Chabanel Street, with its variety of hard-driven tenants. Rotchin is one of six nominees for the award, sponsored by Books in Canada and Amazon.ca. The winner will be announced later this year in Toronto. The $7,500 prize is the richest in Canada for a debut novel.

Death Report Revoked

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Embassy in Israel reportedly revoked a death report for a U.S. citizen that listed his place of death as "Jerusalem, Israel." The Jerusalem Post reported that Wendy Serlin of Beit Shemesh received a letter last month from the embassy, revoking its death report for her father, Myron Friedman, who died in 2002. Serlin says the report, issued shortly after Friedman's death, was revoked for political reasons: the U. S. Congress passed an act in 1995 stating the United States should recognize Jerusalem as Israel's capital, but presidents Bill Clinton and George W. Bush have invoked a security waiver to delay moving its embassy to Jerusalem. The revocation followed a separate case in which Serlin's neighbours, Naomi and Ari Zivotofsky, sued the U.S. State Department in 2003 to have their son's place of birth be listed as "Jerusalem, Israel." The Zivotofskys submitted Friedman's death report as evidence. U.S. officials wouldn't comment on Friedman's case.

Regulator Clears Show

LONDON — Britain's broadcast regulator ruled that a TV portrayal of a major Jewish political figure as a Dickensian crook was not meant to cause offence. Ofcom ruled last month on a Channel 4 program that portrayed Lord Levy, the Labour Party's chief fundraiser, as Charles Dickens' character Fagin. Levy was shown in a grey suit with a prosthetic hook nose and singing You've Got to Pick a Pocket or Two, a song from the musical Oliver. In response to 11 complaints, which led to the Ofcom probe, Channel 4 said Fagin was "easily identifiable as a cunning ringleader of an enterprise with the sole aim of getting money out of people." The skit targeted "loans-for-peerages," a scandal surrounding Labour party fundraising. Ofcom said Channel 4 had "no intention to cause offence or focus the sketch on Lord Levy's Jewish background."

Cemetery Vandalized

VILNIUS — Nineteen tombstones in a Jewish cemetery near the Lithuanian capital of Vilnius were toppled June 24, the leader of Lithuania's Jewish community says. Simonas Alperavicius said the attack may be linked to the 65th anniversary of the June 23, 1941, uprising of Lithuanian nationalists against the Soviet Union.

TV Producer Dies

LOS ANGELES — Hollywood producer Aaron Spelling died June 23 in Los Angeles at 83. He had suffered a stroke June 18. Spelling, born in 1923 to struggling Jewish immigrants in Texas, was a prolific producer of hit TV shows, including Charlie's Angels, Love Boat and Beverly Hills, 90210.

Corrie Play To Open

NEW YORK — An off-Broadway play about a pro-Palestinian activist will open in New York. My Name Is Rachel Corrie will begin a month-long run Oct. 15 at the Minetta Lane Theater. The play was set to open at another New York theater in March but was delayed after concerns from the Jewish community. Corrie was run over and killed by an Israeli bulldozer as she tried to prevent it from searching for Palestinian arms-smuggling tunnels in Gaza in 2003.

Anti-Semitism High in Muslim Lands: Poll

WASHINGTON — Anti-Jewish sentiment is nearly universal in Jordan and Egypt, a new survey has found.

Some 98 per cent of respondents in Jordan and 97 per cent in Egypt – two Arab countries with peace treaties with Israel – harbour anti-Jewish feelings, while negative feelings about Jews were "overwhelming" in other Muslim countries surveyed as part of the Pew Global Attitudes Project for 2006, the New York Times reported. Other Muslim nations polled included Indonesia, Nigeria, Pakistan and Turkey.

In followup interviews, Muslims said the primary cause for poor relations with the Western world is the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. The survey also found that in Egypt, Indonesia, Jordan and Turkey, the majority of respondents don't believe Arabs carried out the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks on New York and Washington.

Suppliers Subpoenaed

NEW YORK — Federal subpoenas were served against several kosher meat suppliers in the United States in connection with an antitrust investigation. The New York Jewish Week reported that AgriProcessors, in Postville, Iowa, is among those hit with the subpoenas. The subpoenas could be focusing on collusion within the kosher industry. The Conservative movement is currently investigating complaints about working conditions at AgriProcessors, the country's largest kosher slaughterhouse. After an animal-rights group produced an undercover video of conditions at the plant in 2004, investigators with the U.S. Agriculture Department determined that some plant employees had violated humane slaughter regulations.

Jews Go in NBA Draft

NEW YORK — Three Jewish basketball players were selected in last week's NBA draft. The Los Angeles Lakers took UCLA's Jordan Farmar in round one, while Israelis Lior Eliyahu went to Orlando and Yotam Halperin went to Seattle in round two. Eliyahu's rights were later traded to Houston.

Think-tank Closing

NEW YORK — A modern Orthodox think-tank is closing, partly due to financial issues, the New York Jewish Week reported. Edah was founded nine years ago to strengthen centrist Orthodoxy as the movement drifts to the right.

Rabbi, high schoolers press MPs on Darfur

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Spring in Ottawa sees many tourists visiting Parliament Hill, but a recent trip by 20 Montreal high school students had a very serious purpose: to urge MPs to help the people of the Darfur region of Sudan.

The Grade 11 students, led by Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz of Montreal's Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem synagogue, recently took part in the March of the Living, an educational program that takes teens to Poland to visit the concentration camps.

Seeing the physical evidence of inhumanity and unimaginable cruelty, Rabbi Steinmetz said he was reminded that this is not just history – the same thing is happening today in Darfur.

"After visiting the concentration camps, many of the teenage students I was with began to search for a way to respond," he said. "They wondered if the slogan 'Never again' really had any meaning if after the Holocaust the world stood by during subsequent atrocities in Cambodia, Bosnia and Rwanda. They wondered if they could make a difference for the people in Darfur."

His idea to take the students to Ottawa to "talk to anyone who will listen" resulted in an action-packed day as they met

Travel aides for Israel

From the editor's desk

Among the many blessings of working at The CJN is the opportunity it affords to visit Israel each year. Though there is always work to be done during those visits – people to interview and stories to write – the place always yields something spectacular. The combination of history, geography, flora, fauna, climate, culture, cuisine, accommodations, religion, and the amazing people is uniquely felicitous.

Each facet of the country – and of course there are so many more – is like a crystal of sharp colour in a large, constantly kinetic kaleidoscope that in ever-spinning contact with the other facets, creates indescribable patterns of human experiences.

Anyone who has been to Israel will know immediately what I mean. Anyone who hasn't yet been there, ought to mark the place on their travel destinations. And for those people who are making Israel a travel destination, first-timers or veterans, the following two travel aides are extremely helpful.

* * *

Like a hat to a hiker in the Negev Desert, Fodor's Israel (6th edition) is more than a good thing to have. It is highly recommended.

Conveniently sized to fit into any knapsack or purse, it is a mini-encyclopedia of easy-to-find, indispensable information and travel tips.

Its logical, uncomplicated format is a pleasant compliment to the substance of the entries in the book, which essentially fall into three categories: useful tips that skip across the surface; general background that provide a myriad of contextual settings; or surprisingly in-depth elaborations that encourage and facilitate further inquiry.

Much of the substantive information virtually leaps off the page as a result of the breezy layout and visually engaging, colour-coordinated artwork.

But it is not the substantive information alone that accounts for Fodor's Israel high standing as a travel guide. It has some 25 maps and a comprehensive index, the sine qua non of quick, easy, reliable retrieval of the very useful information.

I did not know before I read it in Fodor's that eight chess grand masters live in Be'er Sheva, a higher per capita ratio than any other city in the wide.

The world's largest manufacturer of generic drugs is based in Israel. Teva Pharmaceuticals supplies one out of every 16 prescriptions in the United States.

Nor did I know, before I read it in Fodor's Israel, that the Jewish state is the only country in the world to end the 20th century with more trees than it had at the beginning of the century. Israel planted more than 240 million trees in the 20th century.

Fodor's Israel shines with many such nuggets of esoteric and practical information. It is entertaining, instructive, helpful and pragmatic. In short, it is a perfect travel companion.

***

For anyone focusing their visit to Israel on its ethereal and earthly capital, Jerusalem, the special issue of Eretz magazine dedicated to Jerusalem is a handy reference guide. And like all good travel books, it is a worthwhile read on its own merits, not merely as a means to an exciting Jerusalem vacation but also as a multidisciplinary immersion into this remarkable ancient modern city.

Eretz magazine, published six times a year, is a journal of exploration for anyone interested in the Jewish state. Its stories are off-the-beaten-track features of geography, topography, archeology, architecture, history, sociology, culture, cuisine and much more.

With seemingly no compromise on production values, the pages are glossy synergies of photographic art and snappy, reliable writing.

Yadin Roman and Dita Kohl, the editors of Eretz and its sister publication, Metropolis respectively, explained their reason for publishing this special Jerusalem edition of Eretz. "We have tried to do something different – to capture the new spirit that is emerging… to put a finger on the essence of Jerusalem… It [this issue] was put together with a great love for what is, to us, the most amazing city in the world."

To achieve their purpose, the editors have conscripted a blue-chip roster of writers, photographers and Jerusalem aficionados. Some two-dozen feature articles and myriad accompanying photographs inform and inspire the reader.

Along with the magazine itself, the editors have provided a separate map of and handy city guide to Jerusalem.

After the Jerusalem visit is over, this special Eretz magazine deserves a place on the coffee table.

Refugee conference shines positive light on Israel

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Leah Biteolin, an Israeli originally from Ethiopia, says that many people outside of Israel are surprised when they meet her.

"If they've never met an Israeli, they don't believe that we can look different," she said.

Biteolin, 24, who works with Ethiopian Jews for the Jewish Agency, was in Toronto recently to take part in the first-ever international refugee rights conference sponsored by the Canadian Council for Refugees (CCR).

Also at the conference from Israel was Anat Ben-Dor, 38, the country's only refugee lawyer. "People are also surprised to learn that Israel has a refugee policy," she said in an interview after the conference.

Israeli refugee lawyer Anat Ben-Dor, left; Mila Voihanski, director of immigrant services for Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Canada, centre; and Leah Biteolin, an Israeli from Ethiopia who works with Ethiopian Jews for the Jewish Agency.

Representatives from about 44 countries, including Iran, South Korea, Egypt, Bulgaria, Spain, Ecuador and Mexico, attended the June 17-19 conference, held at the Centre for Refugee Studies at York University.

Workshops and panels were held in English, French and Spanish, with simultaneous translations.

Mila Voihanski, director of immigrant services for Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Canada, (JIAS), a founding CCR agency, said that in past Canadian conferences, she found that many stereotypes existed about Israel.

"People, even those from Canada, do not know that Israel resettles more immigrants than any other country," Voihanski said.

About nine months ago, she said, she approached the CCR executive about inviting people from Israel to the conference. "We wanted to show people that there is much more to Israel than the conflict."

It would be a great opportunity for people around the world to meet Israelis, she said, "and bring back positive messages about Israel to their own country. They can tell them that they met vibrant women who worked with non-Jewish refugees in Israel."

Biteolin, who arrived in Israel with her family in 1984, said the conference gave participants a rare opportunity to meet Israelis, "and see that we live a normal life.

"Refugees choose to come to Israel because they recognize it as a place where they will be safe," Biteolin said.

"The only criticism they have of Israel is that once they are a refugee, they are always a refugee. There is no mechanism in place for a non-Jew to become a citizen."

Ben-Dor, who Voihanski calls "the lone ranger," said that despite its record, Israel can still learn a lot from Canada with respect to a fair refugee system.

"I suggested that Canadian lawyers come to Israel and train our lawyers in refugee law. Our legislation is more informal. There is nothing entrenched [in law] and we could use some tutoring."

She got into refugee law almost by accident, she said.

"[Through my work at Tel Aviv University] I met an asylum seeker, so I researched the issue and taught myself about asylum law. I decided that if we know nothing, then the policymakers know nothing."

Israel provides temporary protection for nationals from Sierra Leone, Liberia, Ivory Coast and Congo, she said. "They are allowed to stay while war is raging in their country, but [some] people from Sierra Lione have been in Israel for 12 years. They feel like Israelis, but they have no legal rights to remain."

A "burning" issue involves 220 Sudanese refugees now detained by Israel. "They had applied for refugee status in Egypt, but they crossed to Israel because living conditions were not good in Egypt," Ben-Dor said.

"Israel is worried about them, because Sudan is an enemy state, but human rights activists feel it is wrong to detain them. Some of [the refugees], however, feel they are better off in an Israeli jail than in their own country," she added.

Voihanski said the conference was successful "because participants did not have this image of Israel. [I think] we came out looking positive.

"I'd like to see another conference in about three years, maybe in a different country."

Israel folk-dance enthusiasts to gather

By JENNA ROSMAN
CJN Intern

The first Toronto IsReal Dance Festival kicked off Canada Day weekend at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre in downtown Toronto.

"We took Canada Day especially and [the festival was] open to anyone at all, and we hope that in the next few years we'll find a way to incorporate the [outside] community more," said Yossi Strauch, a folk-dance instructor at israeli folk dancing Toronto and chair of the Toronto IsReal Dance Festival committee.

"We might think of adding beginners lessons [to the event in the future]. It is right now pretty high-level dancing."

Strauch, a Torontonian who lived on an Israeli kibbutz from 1961 to '89, said Israeli folk-dance enthusiasts from across the United States including Minnesota, Ohio, New York, and California attended the event, which attracted approximately 150 participants, averaging 35 years old.

He said people were drawn to the festival because renowned Israeli choreographers Rafi Ziv and Yaron Malichi were featured and participated in question and answer sessions on Saturday and Sunday.

"These choreographers are top-notch. They teach in Israel and their classes are 300 to 400 people," he said, adding that expenses exceeded $6,000 to bring each choreographer to Toronto.

"Israeli folk dancing is alive. There are choreographers in North America, who make up Israeli dances, and they either have a very strong history of dancing, or they are people who lived in Israel and learned how to dance," said Strauch.

The event kicked off last Friday, June 30, at 7 p.m. with a Shabbat dinner and entertainment. Folk dancing commenced at 9:30 p.m. until 2 a.m. The festival wrapped up on Sunday, July 2, at 2 a.m. after 4½ hours of folk dancing.

"It's our first year, and if we are successful, we will continue," said Strauch, adding that Israeli folk-dancing festivals take place annually throughout the United States.

Strauch said the Toronto event was not for profit and that organizers were working "out of a labour of love."

"We are not only volunteering but paying some of the bills in some cases as well," he added.

Strauch said the dance festival needs financial help from the community as it doesn't attract as many participants as other festivals.

The event was sponsored in part by State of Israel Bonds, the Miles Nadal JCC Toronto, IFG Canada and Deloitte.

British imam denied entry into Canada

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Immigration Minister Monte Solberg has apparently heeded the call of Canadian faith groups to ban a controversial British imam from entering Canada to speak at a Muslim youth conference in Toronto.

Sheik Riyadh ul-Haq, formerly the imam at a Birmingham, England, mosque, who has been accused of vilifying Jews, Hindus, and moderate Muslims, was set to speak at the Youth Tarbiyah conference on June 30, organized by the Islamic Foundation of Toronto.

Canadian Jewish Congress national president Ed Morgan said he heard last week through media reports that Solberg had informed immigration officials that ul-Haq should be barred from entering the country because his views could incite terror and hatred.

"If it is confirmed, I'll be pleased with the decision, because it means that the government did the right thing," Morgan said.

Earlier in the week, the Toronto Star reported that Air Canada's gate security and ticket agents received a memo from the Canadian High Commission in London that said ul-Haq would be unable to board an Air Canada flight until he contacted the Commission.

A spokesperson for the Canadian immigration office did not return calls for confirmation by The CJN's deadline.

After news broke that the controversial imam was set to lecture in Hamilton, Montreal and Toronto, Muslim, Hindu, Jewish and gay-rights groups wrote an open letter in hopes of convincing Solberg to refuse ul-Haq entry to Canada under anti-hate laws.

"We wrote an open letter to the immigration minister with all the groups who were offended by ul-Haq. I think the force of the four groups – Muslims, Jews, Hindus and gay and lesbian groups – coming together… was quite powerful," Morgan said.

Following the news, the CJC released a statement commending Solberg's reported decision to bar the imam from coming to Canada and emphasized the importance of speaking out against those who incite hatred.

Church urged to reject boycott call

The church motion, which was passed as the Israeli army launched its first major raid into the Gaza Strip since Israel's Gaza withdrawal last summer, was supported by the Canadian Arab Federation, the Alliance of Concerned Jewish Canadians and the Jewish Women's Committee to End the Occupation.

The motion revived a 2003 United Church resolution that endorsed a boycott of companies and goods connected with Israel's occupation of the territories.

That resolution recognized Israel's right to exist in peace and security within internationally accepted borders and the right of the Palestinians to statehood.

It also stated that "the path to peace is dependent on the ending of the Israeli occupation of the West Bank, Gaza and east Jerusalem, including the withdrawal of Israeli settlements there."

The motion was justified on the grounds that boycotts and sanctions "are time-honoured non-violent ways of bringing an end to intolerable situations."

David Katz, Congress' secretary-treasurer, said the motion was "a blatant attempt" by the church to short-circuit a discussion next month by its national body on the Arab-Israeli dispute.

"We will continue to reach out vigorously to United Church members, both inside and outside the Toronto Conference, to reject divestment now and at the upcoming [national] General Council as an unjust and misguided attempt to punish Israel and as counterproductive to achieving peace," Katz said.

"We call on leaders and members of the United Church of Canada to reject this position outright. Our community cannot help but view this motion as insensitive to Canadian Jewry's inherent and unbreakable attachment to the State of Israel."

Katz added that the Toronto Conference's support for the "extreme and misinformed" resolution adopted by CUPE Ontario last month "speaks to the intentions of this group. This is a call for action without reflection."

Steven Shulman, Congress' Ontario regional director and national counsel, said the Toronto Conference motion would only embolden extremists.

"It's really quite surprising that the Toronto Conference chose to link its motion with the CUPE resolution, which has received an overwhelmingly negative response."

Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith, said the Toronto Conference has "a long history of looking at the [Arab-Israeli] conflict solely from the point of view of the Palestinians. The United Church cannot claim… to promote peace and understanding among Arabs and Jews and then work to the detriment of one party to the conflict, namely Israel."

In addition, Charles McVety, president of Canada Christian College, expressed opposition to the Toronto Conference motion, saying it revealed "blind sightedness and hatred for Israel."

Combs said the Toronto Conference will urge members, congregations and related church bodies "to refuse to buy any products produced in the illegal settlements and to divest from five multinational companies – Caterpillar, Boeing, Canadian Aviation Electronics, General Electric and Lockheed Martin – involved in the military occupation of the Palestinian territories."

She acknowledged that the church's Toronto chapter remains the only one in Canada to have adopted such a motion.

The motion passed last week appears to be the culmination of a visit by a United Church delegation to Israel and the Palestinian areas three years ago.

Upon completion of the trip, the church, the largest Protestant denomination in Canada, issued this statement: "The overall impression of the visit confirmed for us the need for an end to the Israeli occupation of the West Bank and Gaza for the sake of both Israelis and Palestinians."

The spirit of Entebbe

Anyone who was not a youngster in 1976 will still recall with perfect clarity their nearly disabling shiver of disbelief upon hearing the news of the Entebbe rescue. As details of the operation emerged, of course, we tempered our sense of amazement with melancholy over the losses suffered in the rescue. But the raw daring of the mission was like a jolt of adrenaline into our worried hearts. It stirred us out of a debilitating haze of anger and bitterness with the living proof that all things were possible if we but only cared enough and mustered all our strength. It was the most magnificent illustration of the timeless affirmation of Jewish fellowship: Kol Yisrael arevim zeh lazeh. All of us (Israel) are responsible for each other.

The communal ties that interconnect across space and time are not merely platitudes of peoplehood or musings of some amorphous metaphysical link, but tangible cords of feeling and responsibility.

The Air France flight was hijacked to Entebbe Airport in Uganda by Palestinian and German terrorists. Uganda's dictator-ruler-for-life, Idi Amin Dada, was the hijackers' bombastic accomplice. The passengers were separated. The sickening scene was familiar to us all, for it had played all over Europe only 3½ decades earlier. Jews on one side, non-Jews on the other. We knew and we dreaded the hijackers' intended outcome.

We feared for the lives of our fellow Jews, captives of a handful of hair-triggered, hate-filled terrorists and their buffoonish yet wildly dangerous Ugandan host, in an isolated airplane hangar in central-east Africa, far away from any possible source of rescue.

Except for one.

Undaunted by the distance or the logistical and operational difficulties involved in flying some 2,000 kilometres into hostile territory, soldiers of the Jewish state swooped from the sky in the dark of a Saturday night to save their fellow Jews.

This unprecedented, singularly bold and courageous military action proclaimed to a stunned, and in some quarters a grudgingly admiring, world that Jewish life would no longer be free for the taking. But equally as important, the Entebbe rescue proclaimed to a joyfully weeping Jewish people around the world: "You shall not die, but live. We have come very far to rescue you and bring you to safety." Jewish history had changed.

Daring, in defiance of all odds, and always for the sake of saving human life are the characteristics that, since July 4, 1976, capture the essence of the spirit of Entebbe.

It is that spirit which the Jewish state has had to demonstrate countless times in its young 58-year history, and which, alas, it is summoning even today in its efforts to locate and rescue Cpl. Gilad Shalit, who was abducted by Hamas terrorists last week.

It is also the spirit that all of us must summon to confront our own personal challenges, as well as the broader challenges of Jewish life, and that we must inculcate in the next generation so that they, in their turn, will do the same.

25 years ago in The CJN

Leaders of both parties in the U.S. Congress opposed President Ronald Reagan's plan to sell AWACS (airborne warning and control system) aircraft to Saudi Arabia. Their reasons included the danger of the technology falling into Soviet hands, the instability of the Saudi government and concern for the security of Israel.

Day school funding

Thank you for devoting your editorial to the important issue of day school funding ("New thinking needed," CJN, June 22). I have read many articles in The CJN about concerns with Jewish continuity. Day schools are not only the best way to ensure Jewish continuity, they are also where we often find our future rabbis, teachers and community leaders. Day school students also act as outreach emissaries to their peers who are not in day school in ways that can be more effective than any organized outreach program. As a community we need to invest more in them, insuring that they do not become an unattainable luxury, whether by directly giving more money to the schools or by fully funding tuition subsidies.

Aurora Mendelsohn
Toronto

Recognizing outstanding teachers

I read with great confusion the article explaining that administrators in the Jewish day school system do not support or endorse the Teacher of Excellence Awards because they were uncomfortable "putting one teacher in the limelight as opposed to the other" ("Administrators' resistance ends teacher awards," CJN, June 22).

The teachers are nominated by parents and students who want to acknowledge the dedication and outstanding performance of educators who have inspired and enhanced a child's learning. As a community we regularly acknowledge excellence. I challenge anyone to read an issue of The CJN and not find at least one gala or event honouring an outstanding volunteer or recognizing the contributions of a dedicated philanthropist, but heaven forbid we recognize the outstanding teachers within the Jewish day school system.

I found director of education at Bialik Hebrew Day School Uri Korin's comment that he can't embrace an award based on "factors that do not pertain to school performance, such as parent satisfaction" indicates a profound misunderstanding as to whose satisfaction is ultimately important. It's time that Jewish day school administrators woke up to the fact that parent satisfaction is perhaps the most important factor in Jewish education. After all, it is we, the parents, who entrust your schools with our most valuable treasures, our children, and, may we remind you, pay their tuition.

Future of Yiddish

I was pleased to see that The CJN gave such full coverage to the session on "The Futures of Yiddish Education and Culture in Canada," the closing session of the 2006 meeting of the Association for Canadian Jewish Studies ("Yiddish language needs a boost, say educators," June 15). However, I was disappointed with the article's focus on the decline of interest in Yiddish and the lack of programs to support its growth.

This coverage did not include any recognition or acknowledgement of the forces that are fostering a renewal of interest in Yiddish, many of which were noted at the conference. The large number of individuals who were drawn to this session attests to the vitality of a commitment to Yiddish within the Jewish community. This group reflects the forces that have established Yiddish programs at major Canadian universities, as well as the Ashkenaz and KlezCanada festivals, the flowering of klezmer bands, and numerous Yiddish programs, classes and study groups.

All of these programs express the awareness that the Yiddish language and culture are irreplaceable tools for the fuller understanding of 1,000 years of life and culture in eastern Europe, as well as the history of the Canadian Jewish community.

Although this movement may be relatively small, it is significant. With involvement and energy, it will grow.

Sylvia Lustgarten

* * *

I would like to point out that in addition to the Yiddish language and music being lost, we have also in most cases lost our Yiddish dance culture ("Yiddish language needs a boost, say educators," June 15). At one time, these dances were known to all and were part and parcel of every eastern European Jewish wedding. They were simple dances that could be done by everyone, and they were largely improvised. Unfortunately, these dances now are done only at the occasional klezmer festival or at a few folkdance classes. It seems incongruous to sit and listen to klezmer dance tunes – they cry out for dancing! It would be great to have Yiddish dance included whenever klezmer music is played in Toronto. I maintain a Yiddish-dance website at www.yiddishdance.com.

Grunfeld proved he can still play but...

Dan Grunfeld tore his anterior cruciate ligament in his right knee in his junior, not his senior year ("NBA scouts considering three Jewish prospects," CJN, June 29). Last year, his senior season, he proved that he can still play, but he has yet to recover the deadly jump shot he featured in his first two seasons or his impressive first step, both of which made him a deadly scorer as a sophomore.

Message of Entebbe still resonates 30 years later

By URI DROMI
JTA

Last month, we airmen and veterans of Squadron 103, one of the oldest units of the Israeli Air Force, bade farewell to a comrade, Lt.-Col. Moshe Naveh. His untimely death shocked us all, and as I drove to his funeral, memories of our joint service came to mind.

It was on the third day of the Yom Kippur War in 1973. Since families were evacuated from the airbases, Moshe invited me to stay with him at his home. I returned from a long night flight, and when he opened the door, his eyes were filled with tears: Just hours earlier, his elder brother Issachar, an F-4 Phantom pilot, was killed while trying to land his badly damaged aircraft.

Less than three years later, Moshe was part of one of the C-130 Hercules aircrews who flew to Entebbe, Uganda, to rescue the hijacked passengers of Air France flight No. 139. He never talked about it, but I felt that in his own silent way, he was proudly carrying on in the footsteps of his fallen brother.

Now Moshe is gone too. As I entered the graveyard, I saw his mother. I started to mumble my condolences when this old woman, a survivor of Auschwitz, gave me a stern look.

"Spare your words," she said dryly. "It's between me and God."

What could I possibly say to this woman, who had lost all her family in the Holocaust, who married another Holocaust survivor, started a new chapter in Israel and gave birth to two sons – only to lose them as well as her husband, who died heartbroken after Issachar was killed?

Nevertheless, when my turn came to give a eulogy, I addressed Moshe's mother directly.

"When you were in the death camp," I said, "there were Allied bombers flying over your head, yet their navigators didn't mark on their maps a target called Auschwitz. Jews were murdered, while no one cared enough to drop even one single bomb on the gas chambers to stop their massacre. However, less than 30 years later, Jews were in danger again but this time there was a Jewish state, and there were Jewish airmen flying to save their brothers and sisters. And your son, Moshe, was one of them, with Entebbe boldly marked on his map."

Lt.-Col. Jonathan (Yoni) Netanyahu

> 'The raid touched the raw nerves of every Jew'

She took my hand and her eyes softened.

Indeed, the Entebbe raid, carried out 30 years ago on July 4, 1976, touched the raw nerves of every Jew.

When the Air France plane landed in Entebbe and the hijackers started to separate the Jewish passengers from the others, it brought back dark memories of the selection in Auschwitz, where Joseph Mengele singled out Moshe's mother for life while sending hundreds of thousands to their death.

But times have changed, and Jews are not helpless anymore. With the creation of the State of Israel, they regained not only their sovereignty, but also the capability to defend themselves.

"We are fighting a lost battle," he told his comrades. "All we are fighting for is three lines in the annals of history."

The Entebbe raid won its much-deserved lines in the history books, but it wasn't a lost battle at all: It was the daring act of a self-confident Jewish state, determined to rescue Jews whenever and wherever they're in trouble.

> 'All of us are in this together'

As these lines are being written, Israel has unleashed its army again to bring home a soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit, 19, who was taken captive when Palestinian gunmen stormed an Israeli army base just outside the Gaza Strip.

The Entebbe raid, however, did more than just fill the heart of every Jew with pride, or, to use the saying after the 1967 Six-Day War, "make every Jew an inch taller." It also highlighted the sensitivity embedded in the relationship between Israel and world Jewry.

When enemies of Israel are incapable of hurting her, they pick more vulnerable targets – Jewish targets abroad. Indeed, in 1994, after an Israeli attack in Lebanon, the Hezbollah terrorist group – likely with the assistance of Iranian intelligence services – took its revenge on the AMIA Jewish community centre in Buenos Aires, killing 85 people in a bombing.

In other words, all of us Jews are in this together.

The Entebbe raid also set a high moral standard and reminded us that military means should be used first and foremost for saving lives. Now that Jews are armed again, they should be very cautious in using their power.

The means should never become ends in themselves.

Finally, the planes returning the freed hostages from Entebbe to safety carried a sad message as well:

Liberty can't be won without paying a price. In one of the aircraft lay the body of Lt.-Col. Jonathan (Yoni) Netanyahu, commander of the elite unit, who was killed in the raid.

The best of us go while serving the Jewish cause: Yoni Netanyahu during the Entebbe raid, my friend Moshe Naveh 30 years later.

Opinions

Is it good for the Jews?

For 21st century Jews, the question seems old fashioned, a vestige of the era of Yiddish and chicken shmaltz. But sometimes it passes through our minds: "Is it good for the Jews?"

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

I understand why we think these narrow-minded thoughts. As Jews, we have spent the last 2,000 years focusing on survival. Years of persecution have taught us to be sensitive to changes in the political environment. Survival often depended on figuring out if a news story was "good for the Jews".

Yet this question, so critical to one generation of Jews, appears absurd to a generation raised in a secure milieu. It seems funny, good material for borscht belt comedians. For Canadian Jews, the news is not a life-and-death affair.

Unfortunately, an enduring byproduct of this question is narcissism. Compulsively worrying whether or not everything is "good for the Jews" means you stop worrying about what is good for the world. While we no longer fear for our survival, we have not outgrown a self-centered focus on exclusively Jewish concerns.

That's why there's no shortage of "old fashioned" Jews who may not worry if anything is good for the Jews, but are too cynical to worry whether it's good for the world. They mock Jews who worry about human rights. Helping outsiders is futile, naïve kindness that will simply be ignored. Their view is that Jews should worry about Jews, period.

It's critical to care both about oneself and the rest of the world. The famous rabbi, Hillel, put it so well: "If I am not for myself, then who will be for me? And when I am for myself, what am I?" Of course we must worry about survival. But what are we surviving for? To remain a ghettoized curiosity, cut off from the world? God told Abraham that "in thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed." If we ignore the world, we are ignoring Abraham's legacy.

That is why I took a trip to Ottawa, with a group of March of the Living students, to talk to MP's about the situation in Darfur, Sudan. For the past three years, the Sudanese government has been massacring tribes in the Darfur region. Between 200,000 and 400,000 people have died, and up to 2.5 million people have been driven from their homes. Our group felt we had to raise our voices in protest.

We went to Ottawa not just as Canadians, but as Jews. We went because we had just visited Auschwitz and felt compelled by history to make our voices heard. We went because the Torah obligates us to love the stranger. We went because you cannot be a good Jew without caring about humanity.

We went because, when you think about it, human rights is "good for the Jews."

Good citizens must face the Islamist threat

Apparently, Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper's wife and children took the recently uncovered plot to behead him personally. Speaking after the arrests of 17 Toronto jihadists, Harper bravely joked that he could cope with death threats, as long as they did not emanate from caucus. He later admitted the threats were "tougher on the wife and kids" than "on the person in question."

Gil Troy in Montreal

The Harpers reacted sensibly. They should take this gruesome threat seriously and personally. Far more outrageous is the way too many people tried to obscure the latest Islamist threat. In a triumph of politically correct doublespeak, the RCMP described the 17 suspects, six of whom attended the same Sunni mosque and at least 16 of whom are Muslims, by saying "They represent the broad strata of our society. Some are students, some are employed, some are unemployed."

Less than a month later, American reportage was equally laughable when federal agents foiled the Miami "terror plot." It took CNN seven minutes – an eternity in TV-land – before anyone uttered the word "Muslim." The Associated Press dithered for seven paragraphs before acknowledging the obvious.

Such willful ignorance adds another dimension to today's "asymmetrical warfare." For years now, a hateful Islamist ideology has targeted the West, while Westerners have downplayed the threat. Many cells are operationally disconnected, but most share the same ideologies, heroes, tactics, targets – and the same religion. Journalists and security officials are paid to find patterns, to see what unites and motivates criminals working together, rather than ignoring clear ethnic, religious and ideological connections. If Christian evangelicals or Jewish settlers, let alone neo-Nazis were arrested, wouldn't blaring headlines emphasize the accused affiliations and ideologies?

Following the cues of polite society's opinion leaders, the Muslim apologia brigade further soft-pedaled the shocking news that so many Muslim Canadians had been charged with plotting to pulverize Canadian monuments and invade Parliament Hill. While correctly emphasizing that the allegations remained unproved, many Muslim leaders also minimized the Muslim connection and pooh-poohed the jihadist motivation. In a classic example of blaming the victim, CTV News reported that "many in Canada's Muslim community believe Canada's participation in the U.S. 'war on terror may be a factor.'" Justifying that claim, Tarek Fatah of the Muslim Canadian Congress said, "After five years of this war on terrorism, instead of going down, [terrorism] has accentuated, it has increased."

Canadians need to learn from the Americans, especially President George W. Bush, and Muslims should learn from American Jews – much as each might find these tutorials distasteful.

After Sept. 11, in what might be his most unappreciated act of statesmanship, Bush focused anger on Islamist terrorists without targeting American Muslims. It's hard to celebrate a negative, but without that nuanced, yet aggressive, leadership, there could have been a bloodbath.

Meanwhile, Muslims can learn about communal responsibility and self-policing from American Jewry at the beginning of the 20th century. Embarrassed by a Jewish immigrant crime wave and facing exaggerated accusations that Jews accounted for half the arrests in New York, American Jewish leaders boldly fought crime within their own community. Organizations such as B'nai Brith and the National Council of Jewish Women worked on community education and dramatic interventions to stop individuals from becoming outlaws. Writers and performers led a communal outcry – Sholem Asch's God of Vengeance, revived last month at Montreal's Saidye Bronfman Centre, resulted from that wave of artistic angst.

Perhaps most dramatically, the "Bureau of Social Morals" in New York functioned as a "Jewish secret service." Understanding that Jews could infiltrate Jewish criminal syndicates better than non-Jewish police officers could, these improvised "Jewish police stations" sought, as one popular slogan had it, "to catch guilty Jews first." Going undercover and sharing information with local police led to hundreds of arrests and the closing of dozens of illegal establishments, including 33 brothels on the Lower East Side. Eventually, the Jewish crime wave receded.

Like the Harper family, we all should take terrorism very personally. We must not become accustomed to the unacceptable. The more of us who remain vigilant, mobilized, outraged – especially those with ethnic, ideological, religious, moral or financial leverage over these sociopaths – the sooner we will tame this beast, or at least keep it far from our shores. No good citizen should shirk that responsibility.

Summer reading: the beginnings of a list

Summertime, and the livin' is easy. Most Canadians make a point of taking some time out from their usual busy routines to relax and recharge. And whether we take to cottage country, the mountains, the shore or abroad, most of us reserve a small space in our suitcase for a book or two or three. To immerse ourselves in the imagined world of a novel or the remembered world of a memoir is a pleasure that, for many of us, defines vacation. To plunge into an account of contemporary or historical events represents, for many, the luxury of time not taken up by the demands of work and other obligations.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

As a professor of literature and Jewish studies, I am often asked for reading recommendations, more so as people anticipate a bit of summer leisure. So here, in a global kind of way, is a short list of works that, if you have not yet had time or occasion to read them, might accompany you this summer, wherever you find yourself.

This summer, Aharon Appelfeld's compelling memoir The Story of a Life will be released in paperback. Considered one of the finest living Israeli writers, Appelfeld for many years found himself unable to write about his childhood experiences in Nazi-dominated Europe. This memoir, written with eloquence, sensitivity and the author's characteristic understatement, recounts how Appelfeld survived, against all odds, virtually alone in the forests and villages of eastern Europe.

When he began writing fiction about half a century ago, Appelfeld had difficulty getting published because his writing about the Jewish European past seemed out of sync with the Israeli sensibility, but now he has a strong international following. Many of you will remember the extraordinary impression Appelfeld made some years ago as a writer-in-residence at York University in Toronto. On his home ground, young Israelis particularly appreciate his meditations about the place of the past in the present. Appelfeld emphasizes the importance of the past in solidifying an authentic and meaningful sense of identity – one's personal past as well as the past of one's people.

A newly available documentary about Appelfeld – Appelfeld's Table – features the author speaking to a young reader at the Jerusalem café table where he regularly sits and writes. The film won the prize for best Jewish documentary at the 2004 Jerusalem film festival, and was an official selection of our own Hot Docs festival last year. The memoir, the film, and one of Appelfeld's novels – perhaps Katerina, or the more sombre The Iron Track – together make for a fine summer project.

In a different vein, Expanding the Place of Torah is a compelling and accessible book by Tamar Ross, a professor of philosophy at Bar Ilan University, that examines the encounter between Orthodox Judaism and feminism from the perspective of an insider – an Orthodox woman who feels bound by halachah and also responsive to the insights that feminism brings to Jewish learning and Jewish life. An expert on the scholarship of Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook (first chief Ashkenazi rabbi under the British mandate, and founder of the renowned Jerusalem yeshiva, Merkaz ha-Rav) and on the modern mussar movement, Ross brings fresh and challenging insights to bear on Jewish thought and theology, as well as the role of women in Judaism. While the book tackles complicated subjects, the author's eloquent and clear writing opens up important topics to a broad readership.

Ross's book is a fine example of the vitality and relevance that characterize Jewish studies coming out of Israel. Increasingly, the works of fine Israeli scholars, writing in English or translated, are becoming available to North American audiences. Ideally, of course, we would want to read such works – and the works of superb authors such as Appelfeld – in Hebrew. But for those few readers of this publication who might find that daunting, the regular publication of such writing is the gift that allows us to enter the world of their sensibilities, thinking, and imagination.

A few words of caution: most people would not consider the works I've mentioned to be beach reads. But they are books that will engage, absorb, and challenge you. And isn't that what the summer is for?

We must be God's angels

By RABBI SHARON L. SOBEL

RABBINICAL REFLECTIONS

In our parshah this week, Chukat-Balak, in Bamidbar, the Book of Numbers, the Israelites are most fortunate. When the Moabite king, Balak, grew alarmed "because the people [the Israelites] was so numerous," he sent the prophet Bilaam to curse them. When Bilaam set out on his donkey to accomplish his mission, his donkey "caught sight of the angel of the Lord standing in the way, with his drawn sword in his hand." No matter how much Bilaam beat the donkey, the donkey would not move because of the angel. Eventually, God allowed Bilaam to see the angel as well, and the angel instructed Bilaam to do only as he tells him. The Israelites end up receiving a blessing instead of a curse.

Today, we have many modern-day versions of Balak, threatening to curse nations whom they fear. We must act as God's angel of mercy by metaphorically standing up to those who threaten to curse the innocent, and we must find a way to bring them the blessings of peace, safety, security and health.

I am particularly thinking of the people in the Darfur region of Sudan, and in Chad. We are well aware that the Sudanese government and government-backed militias continue to attack civilians in Darfur. Villages and towns are being bombed and scorched, water sources and food stores are being destroyed and civilians are being systematically targeted for mass killing – especially the men, while the women and children are being forced into slavery. Rape, mutilation and ethnic cleansing are rampant. Everything – livestock, food stores, possessions – has been looted. More than 400,000 civilians have died and nearly two million civilians have been displaced. Some 5,000 civilians die each month due to disease, malnutrition and continued attacks by the Janjaweed, a government-backed militia.

The genocide in Darfur has now spilled over into refugee camps in Chad – and the safe havens have now been turned into killing fields. Humanitarian groups working in eastern Chad have had to recall their workers. The country's military is unable to defend its long border with Sudan, and the refugees are at the mercy of the invaders.

The crisis is being made worse by actions that have blocked or hindered humanitarian aid. Food is not being delivered until "there is enough for everyone" and the food is piling up in relief storehouses. Humanitarian workers are being arrested and held hostage. The list goes on and on.

We are taught in Leviticus: "You shall not stand idly by the blood of your neighbour." Yet blood continues to be shed on Sudanese and Chadian soil. Our tradition teaches us that human life is sacred because all of humanity is b'tselem elokim, created in the image of God, and the Torah makes it clear that we have a responsibility to preserve the sanctity of life by speaking out about oppression and brutality in our world. As a people intimately acquainted with the horrors of genocide, we are obligated to speak out and take action when other peoples are similarly threatened with annihilation.

Let us find a way to act as God's angel – with the sword of intervention: write to your MP and the prime minister, join the "Coalition to Save Darfur" – there are many different ways we can help. But we cannot remain silent.

We have been fortunate and we have been blessed. Now it's time for us to share our blessings with others.

Rabbi Sobel is executive director of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism and ARZA Canada.

A prayer for unity

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Midrashic Moments

This week's Torah reading includes the story of Bilaam. A Moabite king hires Bilaam, a gentile prophet, to curse Israel. God has forbidden Bilaam to accept such a mission, but he attempts the journey nonetheless. Along the way, there is an angel blocking his path, which he does not see but his donkey does. After a most interesting exchange between Bilaam, his donkey and the angel, Bilaam arrives at the camp. The king takes the prophet up one mountain where Israel can be seen in the valley below. Bilaam opens his mouth to deliver a curse, but instead a blessing comes out. The king is angry and suggests moving to a second mountaintop.

On the second peak, Bilaam once again blesses Israel. The angry king moves Bilaam yet again, and it's on this last mountaintop that Bilaam pronounces the words, "How good are your tents, Jacob, your dwellings, Israel," the very words that appear at the start of our siddur.

The story raises wonderful questions about God's communication with other nations and about the persona of a prophet. And one can certainly ponder the soulful integrity of a prophet whose donkey is more spiritually aware than he is.

Yet the most pronounced absurdity seems to be the movement from mountaintop to mountaintop. If Bilaam is unable to curse Israel from one mountain, why change locations?

The wording of the Torah is very precise. The king moves Bilaam around and tells him that he can now glimpse a portion of the people below. Based on a partial view, Bilaam is to find something wrong with Israel and compose a curse. The message is clear. When one views only part of a whole, it's easy to find fault and begin to curse. A piece of a plan, a single tile in a mosaic, a detail within a full story – each of these elements is flawed on its own. The power, or beauty, of the expression lies in its inclusion and fulfillment within something larger than itself.

The king understands that showing Bilaam a piece of Israel should easily present him with a flawed picture. Nonetheless, God ensures that Bilaam blesses Israel each time. Yet Bilaam's strongest blessing arises from his last view, which, the text tells us, allows him to view all of Israel. Once there is unity in what he sees, he pronounces the words with which we will begin our siddur.

Genesis Rabbah asks why the phrase "it was good" is missing from the second day of creation. This day is the only one missing such a pronouncement. The rabbis answer by saying that on the second day, God divides the waters above from the waters below. The act of separation and division is introduced into the world, and, therefore, the Torah refrains from pronouncing this a good thing. The rabbis conclude that if a Divine act of separation to create the universe lacks such a pronouncement, how much more so would such a pronouncement be absent in reference to our own human acts of division that cause pain.

What Bilaam saw in the end was a beautiful portrayal of unity, which he could not help but bless. We declare our hopes for such when we repeat his words upon entering a synagogue.

Likewise, as we teach our children to engage their voices in Jewish debate, we must also continue to emphasize that unity is the platform from which those debates issue.

Past Forward

"Past-Forward is a rather odd title for a column," I thought to myself when I was given the honour of writing this piece. Yet leave it to Mordechai Ben-Dat, the editor of The CJN, to come up with a clever heading for a byline by a history teacher and archeologist.

I had been asked to write about the impact that history and archeology have had, and are having, on us as a people. As Jews, we are credited with inventing history in the Bible, in the sense that events now had a purpose toward which they were moving. For us Jews, the past has become linear. We see events moving in a straight line for a specific purpose.

Before the Bible, the past was thought of as cyclical. People looked at the past as a never-ending series of cycles. This metaphor is still to be found in the Bible, in the book of Ezekiel, as "the wheel within a wheel" that was popularized in the 1960s song. For the pre-biblical ancients, this concept was to be found all around them. It's still there for us as well, in such things as the seasons, but now we call it "nature."

We no longer think of nature as being "supernatural." It's not controlled by such deities as Zeus, Marduk or Baal. The scientific revolution of the 17th century took care of that for us, and our schools have been hammering it home ever since. In fact, the Greeks were among the first to see that the heavens were not necessarily the abode of supernatural beings and that the movements of the heavens could be predicted, an idea they picked up from the Babylonians that would lead them to the first "scientific revolution" more than 2,000 years before Copernicus, Galileo and Newton. It has been called the Axial Age, and was arguably the first explosion of knowledge with a rational foundation.

We Jews also picked up a great deal from the Babylonians when we were exiled there more than 2,500 years ago "by the waters of Babylon." The Babylonian Exile would have a profound impact on us. Excavations at a number of major sites in Israel, such as Lachish and the City of David in Jerusalem, have revealed the devastation caused in Judah by Nebuchadnezzar and his Babylonian army as it inexorably moved toward its final destination in Jerusalem and the destruction of the First Temple.

Archeological excavations at the City of David by the late Yigal Shiloh in the 1970s and early 1980s revealed the extent of the Babylonian destruction. I was fortunate enough to have been involved in these excavations, where we found an ash layer attributed to the Babylonians that was over a metre deep in places. More than 10,000 people would be forcibly deported to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar after he demolished Jerusalem and destroyed the Temple. Archeology has even found the rations of Judah's last king, Jehoiakin, among the remains of the ancient city.

Archeologist/historians such as Baruch Halpern are using their skills to give us new insights into this fascinating period and its impact on us and our thought. We went into Babylon as Judeans and came out as Jews. Secular scholars believe the Bible began to assume its final shape there, and that Babylon was where we became the people of the Book in order to counter the enormous pull of assimilation and to preserve our heritage, which was in danger of being lost through assimilation. This is one of the first examples of "past-forward." By putting our sacred writings together, our sages had an anchor to counter the seductive pull of this cosmopolitan metropolis. Assimilation would become a major theme, as well as a danger, throughout our history.

Tfillin lore and links, Pt. 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Jewish Highway

"And I will betroth you unto Me forever,

And I will betroth you unto Me in righteousness, and in judgment, and in loving-kindness, and in compassion,

And I will betroth you unto Me in faithfulness and you shall know The Lord."

Hosea (2:21-22) [www.breslov.com/ref/Hosea2.htm]

Those verses sound like wedding vows and they certainly could be. But those beautiful words from the Book of Hosea are actually connected to another Jewish ritual – the donning of tfillin. Perhaps you are about to celebrate your bar mitzvah and wear them for the first time. Or maybe your bar mitzvah is long gone and you want to learn more about the tfillin that have been tucked away in your dresser drawer all these years. The answers are waiting for you on the Internet.

The Torah's instructions about tfillin are extremely brief. "And you shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, with all your soul, and with all your might. Take to heart these instructions with which I charge you this day... Bind them as a sign on your hand and let them serve as a frontlet between your eyes" (Deuteronomy 6:5-8). [http://tinyurl.com/crlhb]

As with most commandments, no reason is stated for its performance. The late Rabbi Aryeh Kaplan called tfillin a sign of the bond between God and man. He said the four biblical passages contained within the tfillin boxes (including the Shema, Hear O Israel...) "concretize for us that God created the universe, orchestrates world history and is intimately involved with our daily lives." [http://tinyurl.com/9nr5v]

Rabbi Louis Jacobs adds that "the head tfillin, the hand tfillin, and the wearing of the latter opposite the heart was all taken to suggest that head, heart and hand must all be brought into play in the service of God." [http://tinyurl.com/b98k8]

The rules regarding the construction and placement of tfillin – two small, square leather boxes attached to flexible straps, each containing four sections of the Torah inscribed on parchment are vast. Tfillin are worn on weekdays only – never on Shabbat or festivals. [www.ahavat-israel.com/torat/tefillin.php]

What about women and tfillin? Rabbi Kaplan explains why the commandment is one that is incumbent on men only. [http://tinyurl.com/9nr5v] On the other hand, Rabbi Jon-Jay Tilsen mentions some prominent women (most famously, Rashi's daughters) who we are told donned tfillin. He suggests that the Conservative movement's endorsement of women wearing tfillin is a natural development within Jewish law. [www.beki.org/womentefillin.html]

On the other hand, The Kolel: Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning website explains why some Jews object to the mitzvah of tfillin altogether. They "feel that it is inappropriate to worship God wearing leather in an age when many animals are treated inhumanely. Others feel that the experience of 'binding' themselves to God is theologically problematic, in that it suggests that we are servants or subjects of a commanding ruler whose will supersedes our own."

Rabbi Neal Joseph Loevinger understands these objections but suggests that tfillin can be a powerful aid to prayer. "Yes, it's an external ritual, but the symbolism is profound: we literally wrap ourselves up in the Torah, and bind ourselves to the Divine. What we wrap our bodies in can help us focus on our spiritual goals. I'm not suggesting that tfillin is the right next step for everybody, but it's been an important part of Jewish spiritual practice for a very long time, and something that all striving Jews should know about and understand." [http://tinyurl.com/7pogf]

And what of those straps? I'll leave the last word to the 18th-century founder of Chassidism. "It is told in the name of the [Rabbi] Baal Shem Tov that the mitzvah of tfillin is so holy it can bring man to a yearning that will make him depart this world. He must therefore bind them with straps, holding body and soul together." [http://tinyurl.com/a53eo]

Wartime Red Cross volunteers reminisce 60 years later

By JESSICA FREIMAN
CJN Intern

To hear Edythe Feldman and Marion Gilbert reminiscing about their time in Europe as 21-year-olds is like living through history.

Feldman, 83, and Gilbert, 82, volunteered in a hospital in England following the Allies' declaration of victory in 1945. The Hamilton natives were the only Jewish participants in the nursing auxiliary section of the Red Cross Corps serving in Europe.

"I swear it was Marion who wanted to join up, and she swears it was me," Feldman said. "We just looked at one another and said, 'Let's sign up.'"

The girls were called up to leave for their year-long stint in June 1945. Gilbert showed up to her nephew's brit milah on the day of her departure, all dressed up in her navy Red Cross uniform.

"People asked, 'Marion, where are you going in that outfit?' We had been called up so suddenly that most of my family didn't know I had to leave that day," Gilbert said.

Feldman and Gilbert set off for England on the Lady Nelson, a merchant navy ship, but their voyage took almost two weeks.

"We didn't realize that the entire North Atlantic was full of mines all the way across to Liverpool. We had to sail down to the Falkland Islands near Argentina in order to avoid the mines," said Gilbert.

Once in England, Feldman and Gilbert were sent to the Park Prewett EMS Hospital in Basingstoke, Hampshire.

"We were amazed by the enormity of the hospital. We didn't realize how young the men were," Gilbert recalled. "Some were younger than us."

The 1200-bed facility housed a VIP ward whose patients included, among others, Sir Alexander Fleming, the doctor who discovered penicillin.

Feldman had a penicillin incident of her own.

"One time, the nurses wanted me to give penicillin to a patient. I had never given a penicillin shot in my life," she said. "Anyway, he lived."

Gilbert improvised as well on occasion. She remembers a patient whose parents lived on a farm. "An egg was such a rare thing at the time. The parents sent eggs from their farm to the hospital, wrapped in cotton, and asked if I would make eggs for her son," she said. "But back then I didn't even know how to make an egg."

The hospital was close to the southern coast of England. Feldman and Gilbert heard about D-Day from those who had experienced it first-hand, just one year earlier.

"The locals told us about what happened on D-Day – how they had to amass every boat they had to help the army. They said that when you looked at the sky, all you could see was black because of all the planes flying to France," Gilbert said.

The reality of World War II hit home when the girls visited London, which had recently been bombed to the ground by the German Luftwaffe. "The devastation was unbelievable. It was all rubble. There was nothing left in the city.

"We were young. We were only 21. Seeing the ravages of war really gave us a different outlook on the world," said Gilbert.

The ladies concur that it was the strong Jewish values imbued in them in Hamilton that inspired them to provide much-needed assistance in England.

"We grew up in Jewish homes and we were brought up to know our Jewish roots. When we went over, we knew what had been going on in Germany," said Gilbert.

Hatred of Jews had not ended with the war, however. Gilbert felt the full impact of anti-Semitism on a train ride shortly after a Zionist group's bombing of the King David hotel, a British military headquarters in Jerusalem.

"I was on the train to Manchester to visit cousins, and I had my Red Cross uniform on.

"Two naval officers were sitting near me, talking about the bombing of the King David Hotel. They said that Hitler hadn't done enough to get rid of the Jews.

"The officers were just horrible, the epitome of the English upper class. I was burning up and couldn't stand it any more.

"I said, 'I'm over here helping England.' They said, 'Oh, you're from Canada,' and I said, 'Yes, and I'm Jewish. My name is Rosenberg and I resent very much what you're saying. The Jews in Palestine are people who lost everything and were not allowed to have a life in Europe. They were trying to get their land back because it was promised to them in the British Mandate. You're saying terrible things about Jews while I'm over here, contributing to your country.'

"The officers got up without a word and spent the rest of the train ride standing in the corridor."

Sailing home to Canada as first-class passengers on the Mauritania, Feldman and Gilbert had another brush with the British army. This time, however, they became acquainted with living history: General Bernard Montgomery, who defeated the Nazi General Rommel at El Alamein.

"Montgomery was coming to Canada to visit his brother in British Columbia," said Gilbert. "He kept to himself and didn't like having his picture taken.

Mountain climber memorializes former student

Toronto teacher scales Mt. Kala Patar in Nepal

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Harold Lass recites Kaddish for his former student Stacey Levitt on Mt. Kala Pattar in Nepal. In front of him is a memorial to her that he placed on the mountain.

Harold Lass fulfilled a longtime dream in May when he travelled to Nepal to climb Mt. Kala Pattar, an 18,000-foot peak below Mount Everest.

When he decided to go ahead with the trek, he added a personal goal. He wanted to memorialize his former student Stacey Levitt, who died at age 18 in 1995 after being hit by a car while jogging.

Stacey had attempted a climb up Mexico's Mt. Ixta several months before she died, but was unable to reach the summit because of bad weather. Her father Ned, a Toronto lawyer, completed the climb as a memorial to her, leaving I Am a Rose, a book of Stacey's poetry published by her family after her death, along with notepaper and pens for other climbers to leave messages.

Lass recalls Stacey as a "sterling student" in his Grade 9 English class who once wrote an assignment for him about rappelling down a cliff. He contacted Ned with the idea of honouring her memory on his climb as well, and asked him for suggestions.

They agreed Lass would take copies of I Am a Rose for the libraries of six trekking lodges on his route, and present another six copies to the headmaster of the Hillary School in Khumjung village, more than halfway up Kala Pattar, for its library.

Lass, who is married and has an adult daughter, also took a small, acrylic memorial in the shape of a mountain, bearing a poem that Stacey wrote on an Outward Bound trip in the mountains of British Columbia in 1994.

Facing the summit of Mt. Everest, near the top of Kala Pattar, Lass wedged the memorial into a niche in the rock face of the mountain, and recited Kaddish before breaking down, overwhelmed by the emotional impact of his mission.

When Lass e-mailed Ned the first time, he was somewhat hesitant, fearful of opening old wounds. He knew the family only casually, and wasn't sure how to broach the subject.

But Ned told The CJN he was very moved by the gesture years after Stacey's death from "someone who was part of Stacey's life but was not family."

Physically as well as emotionally, the trek was not an easy one. "Nothing could have prepared me for what I encountered," said Lass, who walked and hill-walked four to five miles twice weekly and weight-lifted to tone his muscles before he left.

The "corrugated" up-and-down mountainous terrain, high altitude, cold temperatures and narrow paths with obstacles such as rocks and yak dung made for a challenging and potentially dangerous expedition, he said.

Complicating matters, on his way down the mountain, Lass slipped and fell against a rock, breaking two ribs. He persisted in his trek. "I kept popping painkillers," he said. "I was damned if I was going to be flown to Katmandu. I wanted to walk back."

The head of English at Northern Secondary School before his retirement seven years ago, Lass had hiked and wall-climbed, but had never attempted trekking at high altitudes. A previous wall-climbing incident that resulted in a broken wrist and pelvis didn't deter him from proceeding.

He organized his trip to Nepal through a company called Canadian Himalayan Expeditions; the two other trekkers in his group, at 32 and 29 respectively, were about half his age.

Given the difficulty of the trip, Lass said he wouldn't do it a second time. But he would still go once.

'We were exposed to all different types of people'

"We decided to corner him and ask for his autograph after dinner anyway. He didn't want to be bothered, but when he saw we were Red Cross volunteers, he spent 15 minutes with us. He was curious about which hospitals we worked in and was very gracious. He asked us about our background, and he signed Edythe's menu as Montgomery of Alamein. He was very sweet to us," Gilbert said.

Meeting Montgomery as well as the Archbishop of Canterbury on the journey back to Canada was icing on the cake of a year Feldman and Gilbert say was one of the best of their lives.

"We were exposed to all different types of people and we learned from every one of them," Gilbert said. "It was the experience of a lifetime."

Kulanu founder receives award for Jewish leadership

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Of all the awards and the recognition Dan Heller has received as a student, nothing compares to the sense of accomplishment he feels being this year's recipient of the Beth Tzedec Stephen Cooper Award.

The award, which is given through the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto – the school from which Heller graduated four years ago – recognizes excellence in leadership and commitment to the Jewish community.

With a degree in history and Jewish studies from the University of Toronto, an acceptance to Stanford University's eastern European Jewish history doctoral program (he hopes to become a professor) and his involvement with the Association for Canadian Jewish Studies (ACJS), Heller, 22, was more than qualified to receive the $700 award last month.

Dan Heller

But one aspect of his Jewish involvement made him think twice about applying for it.

Heller is the founder and outgoing director of Kulanu, "Toronto's queer Jewish social group."

"I was really ambivalent about putting in an application because of the ambivalent relationship CHAT has with the issue of GLBT [gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgendered] students."

Heller said he recalled one of his teachers equating homosexuality to bestiality.

"I remember that being a hurtful experience, however, the students called ... the teacher [on her comment], and I think that continues to be one of CHAT's greatest strengths. It really is a place that fosters dialogue and Jewish pluralism," he said.

He said that despite the skepticism he felt about his ability to win the award, he applied for it nonetheless.

"I really didn't expect that I would receive the award, especially because of what Kulanu is. I think that receiving the award, it almost signalled the recognition that yes, Jewish gay students do exist in the community," he said.

"It was a hallmark of my four years at university because for the first time, I felt like I could go back to CHAT."

He said that when he graduated, he felt like he needed to take a break from all things Jewish. A year later, he came out of the closet.

"I think immediately after I came out I decided that I didn't want to give up my commitment to Judaism and Jewish life. The first thing I did in university that was heavily involving Jewish life was the founding of Kulanu. The purpose of the group was to foster a positive Jewish environment for these people who felt estranged from Jewish life," Heller said, adding that Kulanu helps to bring people back to the religion.

Heller added that his proudest moment came when a mother of a CHAT graduate and a Kulanu member told him how important Kulanu was to the both of them.

"She was just so thrilled that there was a place where he could continue to be excited about and express his Jewish identity."

Heller's involvement with Jewish campus life didn't end with Kulanu.

He became the assistant program chair of the ACJS, which organizes annual conferences on Canadian Jewish history and culture, after he presented his research paper about Toronto Zionist summer camps from the 1930s to '50s to the 2004 conference.

His research about the relationship between Canadian Diaspora Jews and the State of Israel and Zionism led him to become more interested in Canadian Jewish history and he continued his involvement with the ACJS the following year.

As the 2005-06 program chair, Heller organized a three-day conference that brought scholars from all over the world to discuss issues relevant to Canadian Jews, organized a klezmer concert, a dinner and a community panel called "The Futures of Yiddish Culture and Education in Canada."

Although Heller said he is unsure about how Jewishly involved he will be as a Stanford student, he said he is pleased with all that he has accomplished in his 22 years, and has plans for the future.

"It's great to be at a stage in your life when you continue to surprise yourself with the decisions you make. I've been very grateful to have supportive parents and a community that has been open to let me pursue all these different avenues."

One avenue that Heller is eager to pursue is to become a father one day and raise a Jewish family.

"My number 1 goal in life today is to become a father. I really struggled with that. Even at a young age, at 13, that was the kicker. I thought it would have to be either/or.

"I feel blessed to be living in an era where doors are opening up, but there are still tremendous obstacles," he said about becoming a Jewish, gay father.

Regardless of the obstacles, Heller and other Jewish gay people are sure to face, he is encouraged by the fact that he was recognized by CHAT as a contributor to the Jewish community.

"I'm deeply surprised and deeply grateful. I hope it is a signal that there is a place at CHAT to begin in a very serious fashion, in an open fashion, acknowledging that there were GLBT students and continue to be GLBT students, and to address the place that these students have in the Jewish community," he said.

"It is really my hope that someone gay at CHAT, someone [at another] high school, will read the article and see someone they can relate to."

Israelis, Palestinians present new peace initiative

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — A group of Palestinians and Israelis from the Municipal Alliance for Peace in the Middle East (MAP) were here last month during the World Urban Forum to present their efforts to build peace and city diplomacy.

A joint initiative of the Association of Palestinian Local Authorities and the Union of Local Authorities in Israel, MAP was conceived last year "in response to the increasingly louder calls of Palestinian and Israeli citizens for security, peace and prosperity, and the stagnation of the peace talks at national level," says Wafa Saad, regional co-ordinator for the Middle East at the Federation of Canadian Municipalities (FCM), which is actively involved with MAP.

The United Nations' Human Settlements Program (UN-HABITAT) has organized the World Urban Forum every two years since 2002, to examine rapid urbanization and its impact on communities, cities, economies and policies. The theme for the third forum, held this year in Vancouver, was "Sustainable Cities – Turning Ideas into Action."

MAP was invited by UN-HABITAT to present its initiative whose goal is to work towards finding a solution wherein Palestinian and Israeli citizens can live side by side in two states, Palestine and Israel, in security, peace and prosperity. They hope to achieve this through mutual dialogue and co-operation between the local authorities and by creating a partnership that will address the obstacles that prevent the two groups from making peace.

In their quest to achieve their goals, they have the support of an international secretariat that will assist the MAP partners to formulate and implement their local action plans. An international board will help determine the priorities in the action plan, which will be reviewed annually and now includes youth and culture, environment, economic development and municipal management.

"The list is limited to allow MAP to establish itself and demonstrate its usefulness and its limitations during its first years of operations," Saad says. "The main goal is to go beyond dialogue and enter into partnership to achieve actual projects."

The international secretariat that supports and endorses MAP includes government representatives from Austria, Belgium, Canada, Cyprus, the Czech Republic, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Italy, the Netherlands, Norway, Spain and the United Kingdom. In addition, the European Union, the World Bank, UNICEF, the World Health Organization and UNESCO had representatives at the MAP presentation and made commitments to support the fledgling organization's agenda.

Together with the Union of Local Authorities in Israel and the Association of Palestinian Local Authorities, the FCM has agreed to participate in activities designed to further Israeli-Palestinian co-operation and to facilitate the exchange of information in areas such as decentralization, peace building programming and sustainable development.

MAPs next meeting is scheduled for October 2006, in Italy.

Nova Scotia community puts shul up for sale

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

YARMOUTH, N.S. — It's a sign of the times for small Jewish communities.

Yarmouth, N.S., once thriving with 50 Jewish families, has placed its synagogue of 96 years on the real estate market.

With only 15 Jews living in the small southwestern Nova Scotia town, most of whom are in their 80s or older, it's no longer feasible to keep the building, said local motel operator Victor Indig, who has lived in the community for 28 years.

Before he came to town, "there was a rabbi and a kosher butcher," Indig told the Halifax Chronicle-Herald. "When I arrived, we were having six services a year. Now we're down to two."

Carol Lee (Cohen) Loebenberg of Halifax grew up in Yarmouth, moving to Halifax in 1958 to attend Dalhousie University. At that time, there were more than 40 Jewish families in Yarmouth, including a rabbi and kosher butcher.

"My generation never went back," she said. "We went to university, got married, and then our parents followed us when they retired."

With a smile, she added: "The Jewish people owned downtown. Everyone knew that downtown [stores] would be closed during Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur."

She said that "Yarmouth was an active community. The shul had a kitchen, a rec room, a Hebrew school and a strong Young Judea program. It was a nice, safe place to grow up."

Almost 20 years ago, the congregation signed an agreement with Shaar Shalom Synagogue in Halifax to take over the Yarmouth shul's assets if its numbers dropped below 10 people or it could no longer afford the upkeep on the aging building.

That time has arrived. The remaining 15 members of Agudath Achim congregation can no longer keep up the building that was a Baptist church 100 years ago when it was purchased in a small adjacent town and moved to land owned in Yarmouth by the Agudath Achim Society.

Indig said Shaar Shalom will give the Jewish community money to donate to a cause in Yarmouth to show that the Jewish people were once there. "We haven't yet decided who will receive our donation," he told The CJN.

After the building is sold, Indig said, memorial plaques and artifacts will either be shipped to Shaar Shalom or to the Yarmouth County Museum.

He said it's unknown where services, specifically on High Holy Days, will be held once the building is sold. Members have talked of renting a room, or even travelling 300 kilometres to Halifax to the Shaar Shalom synagogue.

"It's an end of an era," said Jon Goldberg, executive director of the Atlantic Jewish Council, noting Jewish communities in small towns in Atlantic Canada have been dwindling for the last 30 years.

"Forty years ago, there were nine or 10 synagogues flourishing, all with rabbis. Now there are three rabbis in Halifax and one each in Moncton and Fredericton."

Other communities, such as Sydney, N.S., St. John's, Nfld., and Saint John, N.B., still have synagogues, although the synagogue in Saint John has been for sale for a couple of years. But services in those centres are usually held only on Erev Shabbat and Saturday and are run by local congregational lay leaders. During the High Holy Days, a rabbi is brought in to run services.

Winnipeg pharmacist leaves $1M for homeless

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — It is written that one of the highest forms of charity is to give anonymously. That's the way the late Saul Sair would have had it.

"My brother was a very modest, unassuming person," Ann Senensky said of Sair. "He wouldn't have wanted people to know about his bequest."

Sair died about three years ago at the age of 87. In his will, he left $1 million to be distributed among organizations that help the homeless, but he didn't specify which organizations. His bequest only recently came to light when a member of the committee charged with distributing the funds contacted a Winnipeg Free Press columnist with the story.

Sair knew what it was like to live in difficult circumstances. He, his younger brother, Alan, and their sister, Ann, grew up with their parents in a one-bedroom apartment in the old north end. The children slept in the dining room.

Sair opened his first pharmacy with the help of a $500 loan from an aunt. His sister recalls that for the first few months, he slept on the floor of the pharmacy so that he would be able to open early and close late.

In 1940, he opened Sair's Pharmacy across the street from what is now the Health Sciences Centre's Women's Pavillion. (At the time, the Winnipeg General Hospital, as it was called then, was the city's largest hospital complex.) He operated the pharmacy in partnership with his brother, Alan, for more than 50 years before retiring in the early 1990s. Sair never married.

The lawyer responsible for administering Sair's estate died about a year ago. Sair's nephew, Barry Senensky, an actuary living in Toronto, was called in to take over as executor. He got another lawyer involved and began the process of fulfilling his uncle's final wishes.

"In April, we sent out requests for proposals to nine Winnipeg charities that help the homeless," Barry Senensky said. "The deadline for responding was the end of May. We received proposals back from eight of the charities. I put together a committee of five to review the proposals. We hope to make our decision about how we are distributing the money by the end of July."

Senensky has lived in Toronto for most of his adult life, so he said he didn't know his uncle well. He remembers him as a nice, gentle man with a good sense of humour.

Congress helped facilitate visit

June 20 with MPs from various parties, as well as with Senator Romeo Dallaire's executive assistant.

"We went because we realized that the experience of the Holocaust obligates Jews to worry about human rights, everywhere around the world," Rabbi Steinmetz said. "In my mind, our trip on behalf of the people of Darfur is a fulfilment of the biblical verse [in Deuteronomy], 'You, too, must show love to foreigners, for you yourselves were once foreigners in the land of Egypt.'"

The visit was facilitated by Leyla Ester Di Cori, government relations associate for Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), who briefed the students on lobbying, governmental affairs and CJC's involvement in the Darfur issue.

"It was invigorating to see young students wanting to make our world a better place. Working for Canadian Jewish Congress, I can't stress enough how it is truly fulfilling to see youngsters from our Jewish community take such a strong stand, condemning the ongoing tragedy in Darfur," Di Cori said after the visit.

"I commend Rabbi Steinmetz and all of the students, as they have realized, like many other Canadian Jews, that because we have experienced the Holocaust, we, as Jews are obligated to worry about human rights, everywhere around the world," she added.

The MPs were impressed with the students' concern and depth of understanding of the issues.

"I was impressed with the seriousness of purpose evidenced by the demeanour and insightful comments of the students. They asked probing questions," said Conservative MP Maurice Vellacott.

Alexa McDonough, NDP MP for Halifax, concurred: "I was delighted to have an opportunity to meet with so many youth who were clearly deeply concerned about the unfolding genocide in Darfur."

Liberal MP Keith Martin, said: "I was so encouraged by the interest shown by the students to help those who are the victims of gross human rights abuses. I would really like to thank the CJC for their hard work in advocating for human rights issues on the Hill."

Rabbi Steinmetz said he sees the trip as more of a beginning for the students, a foundation on which to build. "This, I believe is the real challenge. Will these students continue to take the values of the [March of the Living] and make them part of their lives? Only time will tell. But I believe these are remarkable young people and are truly up to the challenge," he said.

Longtime teacher was 'loving and caring'

Obituary

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Hilda Weil, a highly respected and popular teacher, died in Israel, in her sleep, on June 23. She was 73.

Her daughter-in-law, Shari, said she died "with dignity – like a lady. She was fiercely independent."

Weil was born in Bratislava, Czechoslovakia. When she was six, her family moved to Jerusalem. Moving to New York to continue her studies and to teach at Breuers (K'Hal Adath Jeshurun), she met her husband, Dr. Joseph Weil.

The couple moved to Toronto, where they raised their family, and Joseph Weil had a family practice in Etobicoke.

In 1975, the family went on sabbatical to Netanya. The sabbatical turned into a three-year stay, as Joseph Weil became the first medical director of Laniado Hospital, Shari Weil said.

"He had met the Sanz rebbe [who founded the hospital] and was so impressed that he wanted to be a part of what he was doing."

Unfortunately, when the family moved back to Toronto in 1980, Joseph Weil died, at age 51.

Hilda Weil, however, was quite resilient. "She was one of the most positive, strong individuals I ever met," Shari said.

She was a teacher for her whole working life, including at Breuers in New York, at York University, and at Mekorot, an adult education program for women. She also gave lectures and taught shiurim, small groups of people learning Torah subjects.

From 1985 to 2001, she taught at CHAT, where she was co-ordinator of the Ivrit program. CHAT director of education Paul Shaviv said the school's administrators, teachers, students and parents are shocked and saddened to hear about her death.

"She was exceptionally knowledgeable, not only in Hebrew language, but in Tanach, Chumash and Jewish literature," Shaviv said. "The Ivrit program, and its high standards, were her creation."

Her books on dikduk (Hebrew grammar), Choveret Hadikduk and Hamishpat Mivnei, showed teachers how to teach Hebrew, Shaviv said, and became the standard books of Hebrew grammar across North America.

More than that, however, she was very kind to other teachers, especially those who came as shlichim from Israel, Shaviv said.

Last August, she moved back to Israel to be near her children and their families who lived there. She continued teaching, giving shiurim and lectures. Shari said she had planned to teach at Hebrew University in the fall.

Hilda Weil never stopped learning, Shari said. "She learned from everyone she met."

She described her mother-in-law as a "kind, selfless, loving and caring mother, and an amazing grandmother (the grandchildren called her 'the coolest safta') and mother-in law. I was privileged to have been part of her life."

Shari, who spoke for the family, added that Hilda had a great sense of humour and loved a good argument. "You can see from the eclectic group coming to the shivah that she was able to connect to every type of person."

Hilda Weil was predeceased by her husband, Joseph, and her brother, David Kastner. She is survived by siblings Miriam Kastner and Josef Kastner, and her children Yael (Avi) Schacter, Uri, and Dani (Shari), and 10 grandchildren.

An Open Letter of Protest to Prime Minister Ehud Olmert

We the undersigned are concerned members of the Jewish community who are deeply involved in Israel, where many of our friends and closest relations reside, and care deeply about its Jewish and democratic character.

We are profoundly concerned about the massive government violence inflicted upon unarmed protesters at Amona on February 1 this year. We have reviewed the video evidence of the event produced by the Council of Settlements of Judea, Samaria and Gaza, the Legal Forum for Eretz Yisrael, and the Israeli police, as well as written reports by the Knesset Committee to Investigate the Events of Amona and by nongovernmental civil rights organizations in Israel

It is clear beyond any reasonable doubt that Israeli Police, in a planned and premeditated manner, inflicted unwarranted violence and engaged in sexual harassment, verbal and physical, against hundreds or thousands of unarmed civilians, most of them minors, the overwhelming majority of whom were engaged in peaceful protest. It is not possible to justify the scale of violence employed by the police or its premeditated nature in terms of self-defense, particularly in light of such evidence as has emerged regarding the instructions the police received from their commanders and the IDF.

The images of mounted policemen riding down unarmed young Jews and assailing them with whips and clubs raise deeply painful historical associations on which it is unnecessary to dwell.

We are aware that the police operation in Amona was undertaken in order to execute a court order and that a small minority of protesters themselves engaged in violence. That cannot excuse or atone for the massive, deliberate and gratuitous police violations of the law and of civil rights that took place. What happened at Amona was illegal and immoral.

We have in the past and, we trust, will ever in the future be supportive of the People of Israel living in the Land of Israel. By the same token we feel called upon to speak in defense of the welfare and civil liberties of Jews everywhere in the world. Just as we protest violence against Jews in France or Russia, so too we cannot remain silent in the face of the brutalization of Jews by the government of the State of Israel. Our pain is great, but so too is our indignation.

We join with President Katzav and call upon you to investigate and determine, speedily and without favor, who was responsible for authorizing or, in the course of events, condoning the massive police brutality at Amona, and to bring those people to Justice. And we call upon you, at a time when our brethren in Israel are deeply divided over great public and moral issues, to ensure that another event such as Amona, whose effect on the solidarity of the Jewish people within Israel and in the Diaspora must be disastrous, does not happen again.

Conference looks at healing and spirituality

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Jewish healing uses spirituality to strengthen the spirit of people who are dealing with pain, illness, loss, despair and disruption.

That was the theme of a recent one-day conference at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue titled "God Why Hast Thou Forsaken Me?" and sponsored by the Toronto Jewish Healing Project (TJHP), a volunteer organization.

Forty participants, including health-care workers and members of the community, heard speakers and took part in workshops on a wide variety of topics, including "Finding hope when hope seems lost," "What do I expect from God?," "Ten mystical Jewish thoughts to get us through tough times," and "The poetry of pain: how art responds to personal crisis."

Rabbi Joseph Kelman, Beth Emeth's rabbi emeritus and a longtime advocate for people with disabilities, welcomed participants by saying, "It's about time we had a conference about God."

Conference co-ordinator Etta Ginsberg McEwan, who helped found the TJHP in 1996, spoke of two new healing CDs created by the group.

Nostalgic Memories features Cantor Benjamin Maissner of Holy Blossom Temple, and A Healing Lecture Series includes Rabbi John Moscowitz, senior rabbi at Holy Blossom Temple, as well as Rachel Turkienicz, director of the Learning Centre; Molyn Leszcz, psychiatrist-in-chief at Mount Sinai Hospital; and breast cancer survivor Heather Bross.

Keynote speaker Rabbi Dow Marmur, rabbi emeritus at Holy Blossom Temple, noted that TJHP is the only healing program of its kind in Canada

"If the States can do it, so can we," he said.

Referring to verses from Psalms and other sacred texts, Rabbi Marmur spoke of the Jewish experience of pain and suffering and the Jewish response to it. Instead of offering theories and explanations, he said his aim was to bring reflections and testimonies.

Quoting Psalm 22, he commented that in the midst of suffering and near despair, "the Psalmist nevertheless turns to God and seeks divine help. It is indeed the experience of most people whether they're believers or not, that in distress, as they feel abandoned by God, they often paradoxically also look upward in search of solace and guidance."

He added that knowing we can't banish suffering from the world, "we seek ways of transcending it. That's why the Psalmist pleads in love and seeks a loving response."

He emphasized that "the enterprise in which we're engaged is to practise love, neither to hold out a false promise or cure, nor to mount a pulpit in order to preach vacuous doctrine."

Rabbi Marmur also quoted Martin Buber, the great 20th-century Jewish thinker and Bible scholar, and Viktor Frankl, the famous Viennese psychiatrist who was a Holocaust survivor and a disciple of Buber.

"Jews have a long record of suffering, but very rarely did the people despair," Rabbi Marmur said. "Our ancestry found meaning in their history, despite the pain, not because of it."

Holocaust survivors, despite unspeakable pain, "found meaning and love and gratitude and built their lives on these values instead of being imprisoned by the pain."

He added that the promise of healing rests with the community. "Being with others doesn't remove the pain, but it makes it more bearable because it's shared."

The individual healing CDs are $20 each or both for $35. All proceeds go to the TJHP. To order, call 416-944-3359, e-mail etta2000@sympatico.ca, or write to the Toronto Jewish Healing Project, 55 Wellesley St. E., Suite 603, Toronto, M4Y 2T6.

Calgary girl performs act of loving kindness

By JENNA ROSMAN
CJN Intern

An 11-year-old Calgary girl has cut off her long golden locks and donated them to Angel Hair For Kids, which will help transform her snipped-off hair into wigs for children who need them.

Cassandra Macdonald, who this year graduated from middle school at the Calgary Hebrew Academy and will enter Grade 7 in the fall, cut her hair in front of close friends and family members at Calgary's Temple B'Nai Tikvah, on June 23.

She made the decision to cut about 13 inches of hair following Passover this year, her mother, Sharon Polsky, said.

"She said, 'Mom, I need to talk to you. I've decided I want to cut my hair.' It was her choice completely," said Polsky, who agreed to make the arrangements.

Polsky initially contacted the American organization Locks of Love, which makes wigs for children who have lost their hair. She was seeking information on a possible Canadian affiliate organization.

When they were unable to help, Polsky contacted the Canadian Cancer Society, who agreed to send Cassandra's hair to be made into a wig, but "they weren't really clear as to where it would go." They couldn't tell her if the wig would go to a child, she said.

Polsky learned of the Mississauga-based Angel Hair For Kids through an Internet search, and she contacted founder and executive director, Roslyn Yearwood.

"I did a lot of digging," Polsky said. "Once we found out what this place was, I found out a little more about it and was satisfied," she said. "It is a Canadian organization. The hair will be made into wigs for children in Canada from low-income families, at no cost to them. It sounded right."

Children who receive the wigs may have lost their hair as a result of chemotherapy treatments, radiation, burn accidents, alopecia or for other medical reasons.

The two-year-old program is run by A Child's Voice Foundation, a registered charitable organization whose mandate is to create and manage programs that provide tangible help for sick and underprivileged children and their families. To date, it has sent six wigs to Calgary, where it has two branches.

It takes between 10 and 12 ponytails to create one wig.

The organization also raises funds to pay for having the wigs made. Polsky said Cassandra raised more than $4,000 before cutting her hair, and people have been very supportive of the cause.

"We're all amazed at people's generosity. She just mentions what she does and people are literally putting their hands in their pockets and saying, 'Here, take this,'" she said. "They don't want a tax receipt. They don't want anything. It's amazing."

Human hair wigs retail at between $1,500 and $3,000.

Polsky said Cassandra, whose hair is now arm-pit length, cut her hair after learning about tzedakah at school.

She said Cassandra wants to continue to grow her hair long until she graduates from junior high school. Then she'll again cut her hair for Angel Hair for Kids.

Hamas government urges prisoner swap

By KHALED ABU TOAMEH
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Amid growing fears of a large-scale Israel Defence Forces operation in Gaza, the Hamas government has appealed to Jordan, Egypt and other Arab countries to talk with Israel about a prisoner swap that would lead to the release of kidnapped soldier Gilad Shalit and thousands of Palestinians held in Israeli jails.

Sources close to Hamas said the call was relayed to Egyptian, Jordanian and Qatari mediators who have been trying to secure Shalit's release.

This was the first time the Hamas government expressed its desire to hold talks with Israel about the possibility of a prisoner exchange. Taher al-Nunu, a spokesperson for the Palestinian Authority Foreign Ministry, confirmed that his government had approached some Arab countries with a request to mediate between Hamas and Israel to find a peaceful solution.

"We have called on some Arab countries to launch a diplomatic effort to reach an agreement about a prisoner exchange with Israel," he said. "We hope that the crisis will be resolved peacefully and through negotiations."

Moussa Abu Marzouk, Hamas political leader Khaled Mashal's deputy, said he believed the kidnappers want to keep the soldier alive to trade him for prisoners. "For sure, he's in hands that will protect him and treat him well. Our morals and our religion dictate that we do this to every prisoner," he said. But he also warned that a military operation could jeopardize Shalit's life.

Osama Hamdan, a Hamas official in Beirut, said that If Israel does not negotiate a swap, the kidnappers would conclude "that they should capture more soldiers so that the Israelis will speak to them," he said. "The message for the resistance is to kill soldiers, even if they have the opportunity to capture them."

Hamdan denied Mashal was behind the kidnapping and warned Israel against trying to assassinate him. Mashal, who lives in Damascus, was summoned to Cairo for urgent talks with Egyptian officials about the latest crisis.

The Hamas government also called for an emergency meeting of the UN Security Council to discuss Israel's military activities in Gaza. The PA Foreign Ministry said it had asked its representative to the UN to consult with Arab representatives about calling for an emergency meeting of the Security Council to condemn Israel's raids on Gaza.

"We are demanding an international commission of inquiry into the massacres perpetrated by Israel against the Palestinians," the ministry said in a statement. "We have also called for an emergency meeting of the Arab League to discuss the latest deterioration."

After most senior Hamas leaders in Gaza have gone into hiding for fear of being targeted by Israel, movement officials in the West Bank continued to hold press conferences to strongly condemn Israeli military strikes.

Deputy Prime Minister Nasser al-Shaer and Finance Minister Omar Abdel Razek said Israel is waging a "war of genocide." But they said their government wants a peaceful solution to the crisis. "We call for pursuing diplomatic efforts to solve the problem peacefully."

PA President Mahmoud Abbas expressed outrage over last week's IDF strikes in Gaza and accused Israel of committing "crimes against humanity."

In Canada, Canada-Israel Committee chair Marc Gold said the IDF operation in response to Shalit's kidnapping is limited and precise in its objectives. "This operation is about the noble effort to rescue a hostage taken from within the boundaries of the State of Israel, to prevent the Hamas kidnappers from smuggling the victim out of the area and to fulfill the responsibility of all governments to reduce and eliminate a chronic, terrorist threat," Gold said.

He said the "unremitting terrorist attacks" from Gaza against Israeli civilians have become "untenable," and that "in the absence of any efforts by the Palestinian authorities to dismantle the terrorist infrastructure – as required by the 'road map' [peace plan] Israel has no choice but to address the threat directly."

Gold added that "the Palestinian Authority, including the Hamas government and President Mahmoud Abbas, must accept full responsibility for the failure to eliminate the terror network and for facilitating violence… against Israelis."

He also praised Ottawa for supporting Israel's right to defend itself.

Captured officials to be tried in military court

By DAN IZENBERG
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — According to a Justice Ministry official, all of the Hamas leaders who are eventually indicted, including those arrested in east Jerusalem, will be put on trial in a West Bank military court.

A Justice Ministry official explained that although those of the detainees who live in Jerusalem are in principle subject to Israeli law and judicial procedures, they may be tried in the West Bank according to the principle of "greater linkage." In other words, the focus of activity regarding the crimes of which they are suspected is more connected to the West Bank than to Israel.

The arrest and detention procedures that apply to the detainees are based on Military Order 378 Relating to Security Instructions, a catch-all piece of legislation enacted by the West Bank military commander, which deals with criminal procedures, arrests and military court laws.

According to the order, security forces may hold a suspect for eight days before bringing him before a military judge, should the authorities want to extend the remand. Furthermore, a detainee may be prohibited from consulting a lawyer for up to 90. The detainee may appeal the decision to prevent him from seeing a lawyer to the Supreme Court.

However, a human rights lawyer who spoke on condition of anonymity, said it was rare for the court to intervene in military decisions of this nature.

According to a Foreign Ministry statement, the detainees "are suspected of criminal offences such as membership or activities in a terrorist organization, membership in the leadership of a terrorist organization and other possible offences that constitute a violation of the law according to the Ordinance for the Prevention of Terrorism."

Meanwhile, the Simon Wiesenthal Center called for an international arrest warrant to be issued for Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal, according to a press release put out by that organization.

"The time has come for the United Nations to demand that Syria give up Khaled Mashaal," wrote Rabbi Marvin Hier, the center's dean, in a letter to U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan last Thursday.

"Mashaal is the real face of Hamas and as long as the international community allows him to live freely and continue his terrorist activities, there will be no Road Map [peace plan] and no prospects to achieve Middle East peace," Rabbi Hier added.

Family and fellow students bury murdered youth

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

TEL AVIV — On June 28, Miriam Asheri pleaded for the release of her kidnapped son. The next day, she buried him.

Eliyahu Asheri, 18, from the West Bank community of Itamar, was abducted June 25 by a Palestinian terrorist group called the Popular Resistance Committees. Soon after, according to Israeli officials, he was shot in the head and buried in a field near Ramallah.

"He was so gentle," Miriam Asheri said. "It always felt so good to talk to him."

She said Eliyahu was always speaking out for others, trying to make peace.

"Whenever there was a fight, he would always say, 'Stop, everyone should have their place,'" Asheri said.

Eliyahu Asheri laid to rest

Eliyahu was a yeshiva student in Neveh Tzuf, a West Bank settlement, and planned to join the army after completing his studies. He vanished on the evening of June 25 after trying to hitchhike.

Fellow students helped launch a search for him. In the early morning of June 27, following information from an arrested Palestinian, the Israeli army found Eliyahu's body.

The next day, one of the kidnappers showed a copy of Eliyahu's identification card and threatened the teen would be "butchered in front of TV cameras" if Israel did not stop its operation in the Gaza Strip to save another kidnapped Israeli, Cpl. Gilad Shalit, 19.

Eliyahu was remembered as an especially positive and friendly youth. In photos he is seen with a bright, wide smile.

"Eliyahu, you were like my son and a brother to your fellow students. I can't look at the empty chair you used to occupy," Nissim said.

The 'prisoners' document' - don't get too excited

By EVELYN GORDON
Jerusalem Post

Analysis

Whether the so-called "prisoners' document," which Fatah and Hamas signed last week, will end Palestinian infighting remains unclear. As propaganda, however, the document has been an unqualified success.

Both in Israel and abroad, the media (with the notable exception of the Jerusalem Post) have universally lauded the document for "implicitly recognizing Israel," something Hamas had thus far refused to do. Even the Wall Street Journal – not usually a Palestinian apologist – credited it with "implicit recognition of Israel" in a June 15 editorial.

Yet the document does nothing of the sort, and not only is this plain from the text, but Hamas spokesmen have said so explicitly.

To see the document as "implicitly recognizing Israel" requires interpreting its demand for a Palestinian state in "all the territory occupied [by Israel] in 1967" as signifying this territory only, thus implying an Israel alongside it. Unfortunately, the text belies this interpretation.

According to a Hebrew translation published by Ha'aretz, the actual wording is as follows: "The Palestinian people desires the liberation of its lands and the realization of its right to liberty, return, independence and self-definition, including the right to establish an independent state with holy Jerusalem as its capital on all the territory occupied in 1967."

In other words, a state in this territory is merely part of the broader goal of "the liberation of [Palestinian] lands." Or to put it in historical context, this is a reincarnation of the PLO's 1974 "phased plan," under which any "liberated" territory would be a base for pursuing Israel's ultimate destruction.

And, lest anyone misunderstand, both the documents' authors and other Hamas spokesmen have stated this explicitly.

On June 6, Abdel Khaleq Natsche, who signed the document for Hamas, and Bassam al-Sa'adi, who signed for Islamic Jihad, issued the following clarification: "We scorn the attempts to attach nonexistent content to the document, and therefore, we emphasize that it does not contain any declaration or hint of recognition of the occupation state and does not contain any call for this."

Mohammed Abu Tir, a senior Hamas parliamentarian, also made this point in an interview with Ha'aretz: Hamas, he said, has no problem with the document's demand for a state in "all the territories occupied in 1967," but does not accept its "recognition of international decisions that indirectly mean recognition of Israel."

In other words, Hamas doesn't see the call for a Palestinian state as implicitly recognizing Israel. It if did, it would reject this article, too. Rather, it views such a state as compatible with its goal of Israel's destruction.

But the document offers additional proof of its non-recognition of Israel's right to exist: its insistence on a "right of return" for Palestinian refugees and their descendants, which is a euphemism for eliminating Israel demographically. The 4.3 million refugees and descendants (according to UN figures), combined with Israel's 1.4 million Arab citizens, could democratically vote the Jewish state (with 5.3 million Jews) out of existence.

Natsche and Sa'adi, incidentally, have since withdrawn their support for the document, though Natsche said this was due not to its content, but to PA President Mahmoud Abbas' "abuse" of the document for political gain.

Media outlets have also lauded the document on another score: an alleged Hamas concession on terror. Granted, far from renouncing terror, it explicitly urges more attacks on Israelis in the territories. Nevertheless, say media pundits, confining attacks to the territories, while eschewing them inside Israel, constitutes progress.

However, the document does nothing of the sort. It says merely that "resistance" will "focus" on the territories. In other words, the territories will be the main, but not exclusive, venue for attacks.

But the document does not merely preserve the terror status quo. For the first time, it enshrines terror as official PA policy. Previously, while Hamas and Fatah both practised terror, Fatah at least paid lip service to the need to end it. The document, however, calls for "establishing a unified resistance force, called the Palestinian Resistance Front, which will lead the uprising against the occupation, and also unifying and co-ordinating resistance operations and creating a unified political authority for the Front."

Since "resistance" is the Palestinian euphemism for terror attacks, this means that terror, rather than being the work of "opposition groups" (as the PA used to claim), would become official policy.

Finally, the document has been praised for accepting international agreements, thereby also implicitly recognizing Israel. Yet as Natsche and Sa'adi explained in their clarification, "the document's reference to recognizing just international resolutions does not mean recognizing all resolutions, but only those that do not harm the Palestinian people." But Hamas has called all the Israeli-Palestinian agreements "betrayals."

The international community set three conditions for relations with the Hamas government: recognizing Israel, renouncing terror and accepting previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements. The prisoners' document, however, does none of these things. It doesn't recognize Israel, even implicitly; it doesn't recognize previous agreements; and far from renouncing terror, it enshrines it as official policy.

Despite this, the media have swallowed Abbas' propaganda wholesale and are touting the document as sufficient to satisfy international demands. One can only hope world leaders will scrutinize it with greater care and honesty.

Yonatan Bassi: go slow on realignment

By TOVAH LAZAROFF
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — On his last day in office, Disengagement Authority head Yonatan Bassi, who helped oversee the Gaza withdrawal, had two words of advice for Prime Minister Ehud Olmert should he evacuate more territory: "Go slow."

Bassi told the Jerusalem Post on June 29 he believed that six to eight years were needed to properly execute Olmert's realignment plan, in which Israel would withdraw from isolated areas of Judea and Samaria and consolidate the settlers within more condensed blocs in the territories.

"I do not believe that 70,000 people can be evacuated according to the same program carried out in the Gaza Strip," he said. Given its scope, he added, one could not compare realignment with the two-week evacuation of 9,000 people from Gaza and four communities in northern Samaria.

In offering these comments, he stressed that his office had only been charged with compensating and helping to relocate disengagement evacuees. But based on that experience, he said: "If the prime minister would ask my advice, I would say, do it slowly, slowly. We have to do it district by district."

An initiative such as realignment could not even be completed during a single prime ministerial four-year term, said Bassi, as he sat behind his desk in his Jerusalem office.

As much as possible, he said, the program should be implemented through consensus and communication with the settlers involved and with the nation as a whole.

"You must do it in such a way that people will be with you," he said. Otherwise, he warned, there was a risk that many religious conscripts in the army would refuse to execute the plan.

"Think of what could happen if they are against the government's decision," he said. The IDF must address this problem.

In looking ahead to the realignment plan, he said he believed that the Council of Jewish Communities of Judea, Samaria and the Gaza Strip was also likely to play an important role in improving the process and ensuring that it not become a replay of the disengagement, when most of the Gaza leadership refused to make plans for the day after.

Having watched it happen once, the council now recognized it could happen again, said Bassi. "I know they have begun to speak about how to be prepared for it," said Bassi. The council had learned that it was better to be prepared, he said.

He blamed many of the problems relating to the technical aspects of resettlement on the Gaza regional council which, he said, refused to co-operate with his office and assured the Gaza settlers until the last minute that the plan would never come to pass.

"There is no doubt that if we had [worked together for] half a year before the evacuation a lot of things could have been better," said Bassi.

When he first took office in 2004, most of the Gaza settlers refused to talk to him and complained that he was the stumbling block keeping them from finding a solution. The relationship, however, underwent a sea change following disengagement. "Afterwards they understood that they needed a shoulder to lean on and they found it here," he said.

When Bassi announced this winter that he was not seeking another term of office, Gaza settlers urged him to reconsider. But Bassi, who appreciated their support, told the Post that he was ready for a change and looking forward to relaxing and resting.

He is being replaced by Tzvia Shimon, the deputy director-general in the Prime Minister's Office responsible for manpower and human resources.

Bassi said he was glad that his office had compensated some 80 per cent of the 1,750 families for the loss of their homes and that only 20 to 30 families were still living in hotels. Even more significant, he said, was the fact that his office had found communal solutions for most of the families who wanted to live together.

He said he had always supported the disengagement plan and had not changed his mind despite the current turmoil in Gaza.

Hamas officials to face military trial

It is not at all clear whether Israeli military action in Gaza hurts Hamas politically. In what to Israeli eyes seems like the logic-defying reality that is Gaza, it is not at all clear whether blowing up bridges and knocking out electricity in Gaza weakens public support for Hamas, or – paradoxically – whether it might in fact strengthen it.

Furthermore, it is not even clear that Hamas doesn't want some IDF action to further its victimization narrative in the world. Already some in the world are asking whether the capture of one Israeli soldier merits the type of military action we saw last week.

Before disengagement from Gaza, there were some dreamers who said that if everybody just played their cards right, Gaza could someday turn into the Hong Kong of the Middle East. Wrong. Try Lebanon, only more so.

Terrorists want Israel to kill civilians

By ALAN DERSHOWITZ
Jerusalem Post

Opinion

The increasing number of Palestinian civilian casualties unintentionally inflicted by Israel in its effort to stop rocket attacks against its own civilians reflects the success of the terrorists' policy.

The goal of Palestinian terrorism is to increase the number of civilian deaths on both sides. Yes, the Palestinian terrorists who now fire rockets into Israel from Gaza want the Israel Defence Forces to kill Palestinian women, children and old men. If they did not, they would fire their rockets from isolated areas, where there are no civilians. Instead, they deliberately fire their rockets from heavily populated civilian areas in order to induce Israel to cause the highest possible number of Palestinian civilian casualties.

Every time the Israeli military accidentally kills a Palestinian civilian, the Palestinian terrorists win a propaganda and political victory. The more children and women the Israelis kill, the bigger the Palestinian propaganda victory.

No wonder the victims are treated as martyrs. They are the new suicide terrorists – only they did not volunteer to die for the cause. They were "volunteered" by the terrorists who selected their neighbourhood as the place from which to fire their missiles.

This is not a new tactic. As one European diplomat told the New York Times several years ago: "The Palestinians have mastered the harsh arithmetic of pain. Palestinian casualties play in their favour and Israeli casualties play in their favour. Non-violence doesn't pay."

It may be difficult for some decent people to believe that Palestinian terrorists are actually trying to increase the number of casualties among their own civilians, but the evidence is overwhelming.

Not only do the terrorists seek to draw Israeli fire into heavily populated civilian areas, they use children as suicide bombers without even telling them that they have been "volunteered" to die.

Perhaps the most notorious example of this deadly form of child abuse took place in 2004, when an 11-year-old Palestinian child was paid one dollar to take a parcel through Israeli security. Unbeknownst to the child, the parcel contained a bomb that was supposed to be detonated remotely as he was passing through the checkpoint.

Fortunately for him, and for the Israelis at the checkpoint, the plot was foiled. After the Israeli authorities determined that the boy was an innocent dupe, they released him to his parents.

His mother blamed the Israelis.

Terrorists who are prepared to sacrifice a child for the cause are prepared to sacrifice other civilians as well. The religious zealots among them do not even regard their deaths as sacrifices, since the martyrs are expected to go to paradise where they – or at least the men among them – will be served by 72 virgins. (Perhaps the female child victims will serve as the virgins.)

This despicable "culture of death" promoted by extremist Islamic imams, in which an honourable death – even if not voluntarily chosen is deemed preferable to life, is the major cause of Islamic terrorism.

Nor can terrorism of this sort be deterred by the prospect of imprisonment, or even death. It must be prevented before it can be carried out. That is why the Israeli military has been aggressively attacking those who are preparing to fire rockets into Israeli towns and cities.

This is not to justify every Israeli attack. Even if the Palestinian terrorists welcome the killing of their own civilians, Israel should refrain from taking action when the risk to civilians is disproportionately high. Israel should hold itself to a higher standard when it comes to Palestinian civilian lives than the Palestinian terrorists themselves do.

What, then, should Israel do? It cannot simply tolerate the killing of its civilian population. No Western democracy would do that. Israel has already ended the occupation of the Gaza Strip, and the rocket attacks have only increased. Were it to withdraw from most of the West Bank – either unilaterally or as part of a negotiated settlement – there is no reason to believe the attacks would end. Indeed, there is some reason to believe they might increase, since it is far easier to fire rockets from areas with no Israeli military presence than from areas under the control of the Israeli military.

I believe Israel should follow the route once proffered by its late prime minister, Yitzhak Rabin: to pursue peace as if there was no terrorism, while fighting terrorists as if there were no prospects for peace.

Despite the risks of increased terrorism, every effort should be made to pursue the possibility of a two-state solution. This will not be easy with Hamas now in power, but opinion polls continue to show that a significant majority of Palestinians favour some sort of two-state solution.

That's a start. If a negotiated two-state solution isn't possible with Hamas calling the shots, then Israel should go forward with the plan for unilateral withdrawal behind the security barrier.

At the same time, it must continue to attack those who are in the process of firing rockets at Israeli civilians, but it must do a better job of reducing the number of civilian casualties.

If it is true that Palestinian terrorists benefit from every increase in both Palestinian and Israeli civilian casualties, then it is equally true that Israel benefits from every decrease in such casualties.

Among the best deterrents against Palestinian rocket attacks would be for Israel to stop creating martyrs – and propaganda objects – among Palestinian civilians.

BBC rejects call to change terminology

By GEORGE CONGER
Jerusalem Post

LONDON — The BBC has rejected a call by an independent panel studying charges of bias in its coverage of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict to change its editorial policies on using the word "terrorist" and appoint a senior editor to oversee its Middle East coverage.

Using the word "terrorist" to describe attacks on civilians would make the "very value judgments" it had been asked to eschew, BBC management argued in a paper released June 19.

An independent panel found in May that the BBC's reporting from Israel did "not consistently constitute a full and fair account of the conflict, but rather, in important respects, presents an incomplete and in that sense misleading picture." But the 38-page report commissioned by the BBC's board of governors to "assess whether the BBC's coverage of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict meets the required standards of impartiality" found that apart from "individual lapses" there "was little to suggest systematic or deliberate bias" in its reporting.

The panel found that BBC reporting displayed "gaps in coverage, analysis, context and perspective" and failed to "maintain consistently the BBC's own established editorial standards, including on language."

It recommended that a senior manager be appointed to oversee BBC coverage of the Middle East, that its reporting provide a "full and fair" account of the "complexities" of the conflict, that its complaints procedure be revised, and that it reform its use of language.

The report chided the BBC over its reluctance to use the word "terrorist" or "terrorism" and recommended it describe violent attacks upon civilians that had the intent of causing terror for political or ideological reasons "whether perpetrated by state or non-state agencies" as "terrorism."

The BBC's board of governors "welcomed the finding of no deliberate or systematic bias" noting, "most viewers and listeners" in Britain "regard the BBC as unbiased." But they said they had "not been persuaded to change the editorial guidelines" on using the word "terrorist."

Using the word "terrorist" in the manner defined by the panel, BBC management argued, "would exclude attacks on soldiers" and would make "the very value judgments" the editorial guidelines "ask us to avoid." BBC management said they do permit the use of the word "terrorist," but cautioned reporters "against its use without attribution."

However, appointing a senior manager to provide "more secure editorial planning, grip and oversight" in its Middle East coverage would add an extra layer of management that "could undermine the independence and accountability of BBC editors." To improve its coverage, the BBC said it would appoint a correspondent to cover the West Bank and give its current Middle East editor a greater role "in helping to formulate the BBC's overall coverage strategy." Monthly editorial meetings will now be held to oversee thematic coverage of the region.

The BBC conceded that more could be done to "explain the complexities of the conflict" and tackle its viewers' "high level of incomprehension." To help give perspective and context to the conflict the BBC news website will launch a podcast series titled "Undercurrent Affairs" focusing on the region.

But Trevor Asserson, director of BBCWatch, said the only way for the BBC to put "its house in order" is to "improve its systems. Senior editors must be given the responsibility of systematically imposing impartiality and an independent complaints system must be set up that tells the BBC when it fails."

Israel Briefs

Israeli planes buzz Syria

Israeli warplanes flew over Syrian President Bashar Assad's palace last week. The move was seen as a warning to Assad for hosting Hamas leader Khaled Meshal. Israel has called on the international community to press Syria to hand over Meshal, who is seen as being behind the recent kidnapping of an Israeli soldier.

Churches call for calm

Israeli press reported that a coalition of churches appealed to the Bush administration to restrain Israel and calm the crisis in Gaza. Churches for Middle East Peace, a Washington-based group of 21 Orthodox, Catholic and Protestant churches, sent a letter to Michael Doran of the National Security Council and to David Welch, the top U.S. State Department envoy to the Mideast. It called Israel's destruction of Gaza's power plant and bridges "acts of collective punishment that have resulted in tremendous suffering by ordinary Palestinian people." The United States must "insist that [Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Defense Minister Amir Peretz] restrain their military response and work with" PA President Mahmoud Abbas "to find a diplomatic resolution to the crisis." The letter also condemned the Palestinians' kidnapping of Israeli Cpl. Gilad Shalit, which precipitated Israel's invasion.

Airforce strikes Gaza

Israeli aircraft fired missiles at numerous targets in Gaza early last Friday. The attacks targeted several facilities which had been used to plan terror operations. According to the army, 16 airstrikes targeted access routes and open areas in southern Gaza. Seven other strikes hit a weapons storage facility, an Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigades office, the interior ministry building in Gaza City, a Hamas office and three terror training camps.

Israelis warn NASA

Israeli scientists were invited to present key research on "double asteroids" at a U.S. National Aeronautics and Space Administration workshop in Colorado. The paper, which was to be presented last week by Tel Aviv University researchers at the NEO (Near-Earth Object) Detection and Threat Mitigation workshop, tells of the discovery of a high incidence of double "Aten-type" asteroids and the danger of their potential collision with Earth. TAU runs an information centre, supported by the Israel Space Agency and the Science and Technology Ministry, on near-Earth asteroids and comets that could strike Earth.

Yosef-Mokir-Shabbat

adapted from Gemara Shabbat 119a

Jovius shifted anxiously as the Chaldean fortune teller gazed at him. For several minutes the Chaldean barely moved, staring intently. Finally he spoke. "Jovius, everything you own will go to the Jew, Yosef-Mokir-Shabbat."

"WHAT?" gasped Jovius.

"There is nothing you can do to prevent this. It is foreseen."

Jovius rushed through the marketplace, his head spinning from the dire prediction. "Tell me," he asked the first Jew he met, "where does Yosef-Mokir-Shabbat live?"

"Down that alley, on the left."

Jovius followed the directions, and approached the house. Lively singing from inside greeted him. Jovius stared through the window, transfixed. At the head of a table decked with white, surrounded by his family, sat a man who must be Yosef-Mokir-Shabbat.

"For six days we do our work," they sang, "and the seventh day is God's... We eat eat fine foods and wear our best... on Shabbat we rest."

The song ended, and the house fell silent. Yosef-Mokir-Shabbat lifted a silver cup, overflowing with wine, and sang the Kiddush blessing. Then he lifted two loaves of fresh bread, draped with a silken cloth, and recited the Hamotzi blessing. He deftly sliced the bottom loaf, and passed the pieces around to his family. Then the meal began. His wife brought out trays of fish and fruit. After everyone had eaten the first course, again they broke out in song.

More delicacies were brought to the table, followed by more spirited singing. Then Yosef-Mokir-Shabbat began speaking about the holiness of Shabbat. His son asked a question, and Yosef smiled, explaining.

Jovius didn't know how long he had been there, watching, absorbed in the celebration. He shook himself. This Jew was going to end up with ALL his money. This was no time to get sentimental.

"Tell me," he asked someone walking by, "is this not the home of Yosef-Mokir-Shabbat?"

"Indeed it is."

"He is quite wealthy, is he not?"

The man looked puzzled. "Not really. What makes you say that?"

"Why, he is in the middle of a lavish feast! What, doesn't he do this often?"

"Every week in fact."

"And you tell me he is not wealthy?"

"He does all this to honour the Shabbat," the man replied. "That's why he is called Yosef-Mokir-Shabbat: Joseph-who-honours-the-Sabbath."

Jovius staggered away, dazed. This man, Yosef, was somehow going to get his fortune. "No. NO! I will not allow it!" he yelled.

That very day, he sold all his estates and landholdings, using the money to buy a pearl of exquisite beauty. A pearl he could keep with him always. He commissioned a jeweller to place the pearl in a gold setting, and pinned it into his hat. Proudly, he left the jeweller's shop, knowing that nothing could take his fortune away from him.

Jovius' home was on the far side of the river that flowed through the town. He strutted vainly over the bridge which would bring him home, when a sudden gust of wind sent his hat tumbling into the river below. He watched, stunned, as his hat and his pearl sank into the murky depths. He dived into the water desperately searching, but all he could find were fish. The Chaldean was right. He was ruined.

* * *

"Wow, look at this fish. What a catch! We could fetch a pretty penny for this one. Only problem is I'm afraid it's too late. All the Jews already bought fish for Shabbat. Wait — there is a Jew, Yosef-Mokir-Shabbat, who would definitely buy this. Damien, bring this fish to Yosef-Mokir-Shabbat to sell it to him."

Yosef already had fish prepared for Shabbat, but when he saw this beautiful fish, he bought it without hesitation. "In honour of Shabbat," he declared.

The Shabbat was fast approaching so he hurried to cut and clean the fish — and drew in his breath. Something was inside, shining, gleaming. He picked it up and wiped it off. It was an exquisite pearl in a setting of gold. Yosef raised his eyes to the heavens. "In honour of Shabbat," he repeated fervently, "in honour of Shabbat."

Dare to leave your seat belt unbuckled

By JESSICA FREIMAN
CJN Intern

The setting for Toronto theatre artist Julie Tepperman's play Rosy is a grey sedan in a parking lot.

Audiences won't have to use their imagination to feel part of the action, though: they will sit inside actual cars to view Rosy and six other short plays at AutoShow, a theatrical production for the Fringe Theatre Festival in Toronto.

The action of each play, written by seven different Toronto playwrights, takes place inside and around cars themselves.

AutoShow is presented by the Convergence Theatre Collective, which was founded in 2004 by 26-year-old Tepperman, her husband Aaron Willis, and their friend Rebecca Benson.

"The idea for AutoShow came when we were refused the rights to produce Autobaun [a cycle of short plays set in cars by American playwright Neil Labute]. We wanted to actually put on the plays in cars themselves, and The Fringe Theatre Festival liked that we wanted to set our plays in cars," Tepperman said.

"There are so many talented peers in this local theatre community, so we asked some to write ten-minute pieces that could take place in a car.

"What we've ended up with are seven wildly diverse pieces. We're still a little bit terrified of how we're going to execute everything," she said.

The goal of AutoShow, said Tepperman, is to make people feel like they have been invited to an event.

"We want the audience to feel like it's an actual auto show, where anything can happen. We were just fascinated by this car culture. It's not until I started working on this show that I realized how many car commercials we're bombarded with in today's society.

"It's the idea that your car will change your life. The kind of car you drive will reflect the life you have."

AutoShow also tries to capture the private moments that occur inside of one's automobile.

"What goes on inside the car is very different, very private," Tepperman said. "We're trying to get very intimate in the spaces in the cars. We want to give people the feeling of, 'Ooh, maybe I shouldn't be watching this.'"

Tepperman's own theatrical journey began as a young girl growing up in Thornhill.

"My parents always took me to see theatre from the time I was a very small child. My love for it certainly developed from that. I knew theatre was what I wanted to do with my life even before I knew it could be a career," she said.

She is grateful to her parents, who have "always been really supportive" and enrolled her in drama programs since the age of five. "I also had wonderful, influential teachers in high school and then I went to George Brown Theatre School. I was immersed in drama and the arts."

Support for her work has come from fans at Tepperman's synagogue, the First Narayever Congregation. For the second year in a row, she and her husband have directed SHTICK! A Celebration of Jewish Playwrights at the synagogue. "It's really wonderful to have the support from our own personal community," Tepperman said.

AutoShow has been a huge undertaking for the theatre artist. "I've been working on writing on my own and in collaboration. I'm acting, writing and producing this massive project," she said.

Just how massive? The endeavour involves two directors, one choreographer, seven writers and 18 actors, most of whom are involved on a volunteer basis. "These people come on board for the artistic experience, not for the money. We're really grateful for those who have jumped on board for the idea," she said.

This project also marks the first production of the Convergence Theatre Collective, and Tepperman is thrilled to be presenting AutoShow through the Fringe Theatre Festival. "The Fringe offers a great opportunity for artists at any stage of their careers to expand with new pieces. We are participating in the 'bring your own venue' category. We really like being under the Fringe umbrella – we're one of 130 companies doing shows in an 11-day period. It's a wonderful, collective feeling," she said.

AutoShow runs nightly at 8 p.m. from July 6 through 16, rain or shine, at the Royal St. George Collegiate Parking Lot at 120 Howland Avenue. Tickets are $10. For more information, call the Fringe Hotline at 416-966-1062.

Film explores German's moral heroism and family ties

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Friedrich Kellner was a German man of conscience, a court magistrate who never reconciled himself to the tyranny of Adolf Hitler's regime.

A life-long Social Democrat, Kellner kept a diary in which he recorded his impressions of Germany's descent into totalitarianism.

Like the renowned diarist Victor Klemperer (I Will Bear Witness: A Diary of the Nazi Years), Kellner meticulously documented Hitler's rise to power and vented his anger and indignation over the ugly turn of events.

Kellner's diary of moral heroism and family ties remains unpublished, but not unknown. The Canadian husband-and-wife team of Fern Levitt and Arnie Zipursky has ensured that Kellner's cri de coeur will be heard.

They have made a documentary about Kellner and his grandson's quest to translate his diary into English. My Opposition: The Diaries of Friedrich Kellner was shown at a private screening late last month at the Royal Ontario Museum in Toronto.

"This is a wonderful tribute to my grandparents," he said in brief remarks. "If Friedrich could have been here, he would have heartily approved of the film."

Max Eisen, a Holocaust survivor, praised Kellner as a strong, courageous person of vision who stood up, intellectually at least, to the Nazis.

But Eisen, who was swept up by the Holocaust in Hungary, pointed out that the anti-Semitic hatred that gave way to the murder of six million European Jews has not really vanished.

My Opposition: The Diaries of Friedrich Kellner, which was filmed for the CanWest Global television network, tells two interlocking stories.

The first revolves around Kellner, a poet, artist and musician who earned a living as a mid-level court administrator, and the second is about his son, Fred, Robert Scott's father.

In his diary, Kellner denounced Hitler and his National Socialist government and prophetically predicted that the Nazis would lead Germany to disaster.

He and his wife, Pauline, had only one child, and when Fred came home one afternoon singing the Horst Wessel song, the unofficial Nazi anthem, they were shocked and dismayed.

They had tried to insulate Fred from the siren song of Nazism. But like millions of Germans, Fred had been swayed by the Nazis.

In desperation, they sent Fred to the United States, hoping that geography would shield him from the bane of Nazi influence.

In 1937, Fred met and married a Jewish woman, Frieda Shulman, and they had three children.

Meanwhile, Kellner came under increasing pressure to join the Nazi party, but he refused, and continued writing entries in his diary. He regarded the diary as "a torch for future generations to light their way through the darkness" of Nazi Germany.

In this spirit, he wrote of the forced removal of Jews from Laubach, a town in northern Germany to which he and Pauline had moved.

There was more grist for his mill when, in October 1941, a soldier told Kellner of the anti-Jewish atrocities he had witnessed in eastern Europe.

Kellner described Nazi crimes as a stain that could never be erased from the annals of history.

Without consulting him, Pauline burned some of her husband's diaries, fearing that he would be punished if they fell into the wrong hands. But Kellner, stubborn as ever, rewrote the pages Pauline had destroyed to protect him.

Shortly after World War II ended, Fred abandoned his family in the United States and returned to Germany.

Finding herself a single mother, and unable and unwilling to support her children, Frieda placed them in a Jewish orphanage in New Haven, Conn. They languished there more than a decade, during which Fred committed suicide.

Robert Scott was always interested in tracking down his grandparents, although he knew nothing about them. He got his opportunity in the early 1960s when, as a U.S. Navy sailor, he was posted to what was then West Germany.

After a nearly futile search, he found his long-lost grandparents. There were misconceptions on both sides. He feared that they might have been Nazis, not realizing that they were ardent opponents of Hitler.

For their part, the Kellners had never been informed that Fred had married and sired three children.

Robert Scott went back to school, learned German and translated the diaries into English.

The diaries have been displayed in a museum in Germany and at the George Bush Library in Houston.

Within the next year or two, they will be published by a university press in Germany. But after almost 40 years, Robert Scott is still looking for an American publisher.

The diaries may or may not be published in the United States, but for now, they are the subject of an unusual and interesting Canadian film.

Film on post-9/11 anti-Semitism uneven

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

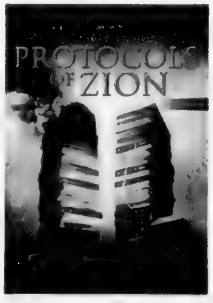
On the weekend of June 24, some 1,200 people gathered in Los Angeles for a conference on the conspiracy theories behind the Sept. 11 attacks.

That so many Americans can believe that the U.S. government, or maybe the Mossad, was behind the terror attacks in Washington and New York City seems far-fetched.

Or does it?

Thinkfilm is releasing Marc Levin's film Protocols of Zion on DVD on July 11. The documentary examines the rise of anti-Semitism around the world since the 9/11 attacks.



It begins with the claim, held by some Americans and distributed widely on the Internet, that 4,000 Jews who normally worked at the World Trade Centre stayed home on the day of the attacks, after being warned by the Mossad.

This, of course, is nonsense. But Levin was so surprised to hear people take this seriously that he set out to make a documentary on anti-Semitism and how a century-old claim made in the Russian racist tract Protocols of the Elders of Zion – that Jews are plotting to take over the world – still exists today.

Names in the News: Edwin and Anne Mirvish, the famous bargain-house and theatre impresario and his sculptor wife, celebrated their 65th wedding anniversary with a private reception in the lobby of the Princess of Wales Theatre last week.

The couple was married in Hamilton on June 29, 1941, and embarked on a life together not knowing where the journey would take them. Along the way they have created the world's largest discount emporium, restored historic theatrical landmarks, built an award-winning modern theatre, produced countless plays and musicals, brought the world's best in theatre to Toronto, and even created a neighbourhood, Mirvish Village, solely devoted to artists. Anne also created beautiful sculpture and other works of art. They have become legends.

Attended by family and friends, the celebration was hosted by son David Mirvish and family, remarks were delivered by Toronto Mayor David Miller, the former lieutenant-governor of Ontario Lincoln Alexander and provincial Minister of Tourism Jim Bradley. Performers Michael Burgess, Andrea Garafalo, John McDermott and Louise Pitre entertained the gathering.

More Names in the News: Torontonian Edith Grosman was in Sabinov, Slovakia, in June to accept an honour on behalf of her late husband, Ladislav Grosman. The occasion was the 40th anniversary of the release of the film The Shop on Main Street based on his novel, which won the Oscar for best foreign film in 1966. A museum bearing his name is being planned for Sabinov.

Shocking revelations of modern anti-Semitism

There are some strong points in the film, including an interview with Shaun Walker, leader of the National Alliance in Virginia, a white supremacist group.

Walker calls Hitler's turgid Mein Kampf an eye-opening book and says the Protocols is a timeless piece of work. He is deluded enough to believe that media mogul Rupert Murdoch must be Jewish.

But at times, Levin's interviews fall flat. A visit to a prison doesn't amount to anything and an interview with lapsed Catholic author James Carroll about the apparent anti-Semitism in Mel Gibson's Passion doesn't reveal anything new.

This documentary makes some good points and its revelations of basic anti-Semitism among everyday urban Americans are shocking. But sometimes it seems like Levin is clutching at straws and using weak arguments to make his point.

The DVD features include extended interviews with Levin, Carroll and the late graphic novel author Will Eisner.

Journey of the Jihadist explains a disturbing phenomenon

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The reverberations of the jihad movement have been felt far beyond the borders of the Middle East, in cities ranging from New York and London to Madrid and Paris.

Jihadists not only want to destabilize existing Muslim governments and replace them with theocratic states, but to rid the Middle East of what they regard as corrupting American and Western cultural and political influences.

These jihadists, who plotted and carried out the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks in the United States and various bombings in Europe since then, are the subject of Fawaz Gerges' important and revealing book, Journey of the Jihadist (Raincoast Books).

Fawaz Gerges

A Lebanese Christian political scientist who lives in the United States, he explores the mind of jihadists through the prism of several of its members, the most interesting of whom is Kamal el-Said Habib, an Egyptian who played a pivotal role in the 1981 assassination of Egypt's president, Anwar Sadat.

Habib was also a key figure in the first generation of Muslim militants who, in the 1970s, planted the seeds of jihad in Muslim lands. Through Habib, Gerges opens the veiled and cloistered universe of the jihadist to a reader.

In introducing them to us, Gerges compares jihadists to mainstream Islamists, who accept the rules of the political game, embrace democratic principles and oppose violence. By sharp contrast, jihadists subscribe to revolution and totalitarianism and are not at all averse to bloodshed.

Gerges identifies Egypt as the birthplace of the modern jihadist movement and of the first mainstream Islamist organization, the Muslim Brotherhood, which was founded in 1928 by Hassan al-Banna, a school teacher turned ideologue.

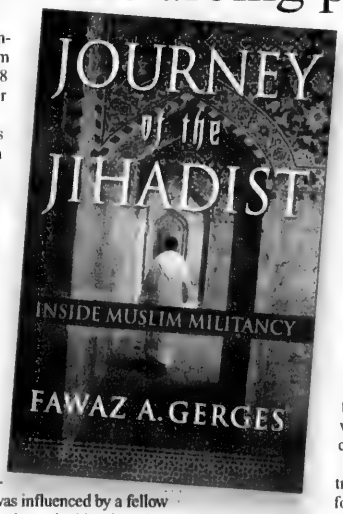
Having gained Habib's confidence, Gerges draws a portrait of a man who can serve as a prototype of the contemporary jihadist, even though he has since left the movement. Not having come from a very religious family, he discovered Islam after Egypt's ignominious defeat in the 1967 Six Day War.

Israel's victory shaped his psyche, driving him away from the fold of Arab nationalism and socialism and into the receptive arms of radical Islam. Like Islamic revolutionaries of his ilk, Habib was influenced by a fellow Egyptian, Sayyid Qutb, a poet who was charged with subversion and hanged in 1966. Qutb, having visited the United States in the late 1940s, was appalled by American materialism. But to him, Washington's support of Israel's statehood was the greater crime.

To Habib, Islam was not merely a means to an end, but an end in and of itself, while secularism was evil incarnate.

Habib's grievances turned on his perception that Sadat had reneged on a pledge to impose Islamic law on Egyptian society, but the last straw was Sadat's decision to sign a peace treaty with the arch adversary, Israel.

His position was that the struggle between Muslims and Jews "will not end except when one camp excises the other, and both sides must recognize this fact."



According to Gerges, the Arab-Israeli conflict has shaped Arab and Muslim views of the United States more than any other factor. As he writes: "On this score there exists no difference between Islamists and secularists, leftists and conservatives. All blame America for tipping the balance in favour of the Jewish state."

He points out that the first truly global army of jihadist warriors was assembled to fight the Soviet army in Afghanistan from 1979 onward. When the Soviets retreated, the jihadists felt so empowered that they took up new causes. In particular, they focused on the civil war in Yugoslavia, where Muslims became targets of ethnic cleansing by hardcore Serbian nationalists.

Gerges explains that a Palestinian expatriate named Abdullah Azzam exerted a formative influence on Osama bin Laden. Azzam, a refugee born in the West Bank, believed that Afghanistan could be a launching pad for the struggle to create a caliphate in the Muslim world.

Gerges argues that the current war in Iraq has been "a powerful recruitment tool" for Al Qaeda, which took credit for the events of Sept. 11 and beyond. Bin Laden's acolyte, the Egyptian Ayman al-Zawahiri, has said that the goals of jihadists in Iraq are four-fold: to expel the Americans, to fill the vacuum with an Islamic authority, to extend the jihad to neighbouring Arab countries and to fight Israel to the death.

Gerges contends that, in the eyes of Arabs, Iraq is as much "an open wound" as Israel. And as far as jihadists are concerned, the U.S. occupation of Iraq is a carbon copy of "the Jewish occupation of Palestine."

In a book of this scope, the Islamic Republic of Iran, probably Israel's foremost foe today, cannot be ignored, and Gerges does indeed examine that bastion of Muslim fundamentalism.

He writes that the Ayatollah Khomeini, the spiritual leader of Iran's Islamic revolution, established the religious and intellectual framework for anti-American rhetoric and suicide bombings, more than a decade before Al Qaeda declared war against the United States.

Apart from its close relationship with Israel, the United States was condemned in jihadist circles for at least two reasons. Washington's "unholy" alliance with corrupt Arab rulers led to Islamic nations' loss of political, economic and military independence, while America's global dominance threatened the future of the jihadist movement.

Yet, as Gerges notes, jihadists may be their own worst enemies. He claims that there are "real indicators" that Arab and Muslim public opinion has turned against Al Qaeda. "The bombings and killings of civilians in Saudi Arabia, London, Indonesia, Egypt and now Jordan have all triggered a torrent of angry responses by ordinary Arabs and Muslims across the political and religious spectrum."

He claims that anti-Jewish sentiments in Muslim countries stem from Israel's creation and the displacement of "millions" of Palestinians. Anti-Semitism is found in Koranic verses, and it tormented Jews long before the emergence of modern Zionism. And as he must surely also know, "millions" of Palestinians were not displaced by Israel.

In this wrong-headed spirit, Gerges' bald assertion that "there were no Islamic pogroms" is simply untrue. Jewish communities in the Arab world were subjected to numerous attacks, though the Holocaust was a uniquely European plan.

For a scholar of his calibre, these are serious errors. Nevertheless, Journey of the Jihadist is a timely, thoughtful account of a disturbing phenomenon.

Matisyahu: An Orthodox Bob Marley

By JESSICA FREIMAN
CJN Intern

Some call him a phenomenon; others, a curiosity. Rolling Stone magazine described him as "the strangest thing to climb the Billboard charts this year."

One thing is certain, however: Chassidic reggae superstar Matisyahu has arrived, and in a big way.

Despite his black suit, velvet kippah and tzitzit flying in every direction as he bopped around the stage at Toronto's Molson Amphitheatre last month, the audience was dancing right along with him, mouthing lyrics such as "treif wine clouds the heart."

Those singing along, however, were not Lubavitch – they were in their teens and early 20s, and were not necessarily Jewish.

Matisyahu's unique blend of Chassidic adages and reggae pop has created such a buzz that his first studio album, Youth, released this year, debuted at No. 4 on the Billboard album chart. Not to mention that it has sold more than one million copies.

But the ba'al tshuvah/beatboxer has no desire to be the poster boy for Orthodox Judaism. "I'm not trying to do anything except be the best singer, performer, person, Jew I can be," he told The CJN in an exclusive interview. "It's not about trying to be a role model or trying to be an artist. I am who I am.

"Like everyone, I'm trying to be as good as I can be at what I do. In the process, if that inspires people or makes Jewish kids feel proud to be Jewish, that's good. But that's not my sole purpose."

Although the genre of reggae pop is not the traditional avenue of Orthodox creativity, Matisyahu believes that what he creates is Jewish music.

"Whatever culture Jews are in or whatever area they were in, they adapted the music of that culture, and then they infused it with Jewish ideas and perspectives. I would say what makes music Jewish is the content of the ideas in the music… so I would say my music is Jewish," he said.

Singing about Galus (exile) in one song, the High Priest in the next, and wanting Mashiach now on his most popular single, King Without a Crown, which enjoys heavy rotation on MTV, Matisyahu is arguably contributing the only example of "Jewish" music to popular culture today. He is definitely the only Orthodox Jew who, in the past few months, has opened for the Dave Matthews Band and shared the stage with Sting.

Seeing other Orthodox Jews make it in the mainstream music world is not necessarily a goal of the 6-foot-4 star. "It is what it is. I wouldn't like to see Orthodox Jews becoming famous just because they're Orthodox," he said.

"It would be good to see people becoming famous that are substantial people and that have something to say, making a kiddush HaShem and making a good name for the Jewish people in general."

In a world where anti-Jewish sentiments are not uncommon, a positive Jewish public figure like Matisyahu may be countering negative attitudes toward Judaism.

"I think my music is creating a good vibe for a lot of people, all kinds of people who don't understand Jews or Judaism. I'm just being out there and doing something positive in the world, which Jews really have always done in Judaism," he said.

Born 27 years ago to secular Jewish parents in White Plains, New York, the artist formerly known as Matthew Miller has travelled a distinctive path since he was taken to a Grateful Dead concert while still in diapers. Growing up, he was sent to Hebrew school and despised it. Later, he dropped out of high school to follow rock band Phish across the United States on their tour and he experimented with LSD.

Next, his parents sent him to a drug treatment centre in Oregon, where he performed reggae and beatboxing locally (beatboxing is the art of creating beats, rhythms and melodies using the mouth), calling himself MC Truth.

Upon his return to New York, a chance encounter with a rabbi and some visits to the Carlebach Synagogue put him on a completely different path to spirituality. He eventually moved in with the campus rabbi at New York University, changed his name to Matisyahu, and the rest is history.

Perhaps it is not surprising that Matisyahu has been compared to reggae icon Bob Marley: both focus on Zion, Jerusalem and redemption in their music. Compare Marley's lyrics "Iron like a lion in Zion" to Matisyahu's "Fire descends from on high in the shape of a lion/ Burn the sacrifice of pride and ride on to Mount Zion."

Reggae phenomenon Matisyahu wants to make aliyah: "I plan on moving to Israel, probably in the next year or two," he told The CJN in an exclusive interview.

Matisyahu can see the connection. "I think there's a tradition in reggae music of artists drawing from the Torah for inspiration and quotations," he said. "Within reggae music today, there's a whole genre dedicated to consciousness. Not all music is like that. In the area of rock, there's no such thing as 'conscious rock.' In reggae, there's a genre: conscious reggae.

"Reggae music is spiritual music. Less is more. It's humble music, it's meditative music. Those qualities in themselves are spiritual," he said.

Particularly spiritual is Matisyahu's hit Jerusalem in which he sings, "3,000 years with no place to be/ And they want me to give up my milk and honey/ Don't you see, it's not about the land or the sea /Not the country but the dwelling of his majesty."

It looks as though Matisyahu himself will be dwelling in the Zion he sings so much about. "I plan on moving to Israel, probably in the next year or two," he said. "I would be based there and do travelling and touring."

The aliyah of this rebbe-rastaman would be a rare example of an international star choosing to make his home in Israel. But to Matisyahu, it makes a lot of sense.

"Israel is the homeland of the Jewish people. It's obvious to me. I was just there. It's still the exile, it's still Galus, and there's still bad and negative things going on there, but it's all Jews," he said.

"It's kind of like a family, you know? The family might be dysfunctional but at least we're all together. Whereas when you come out into the world outside of Israel, it's just dispersed. You don't get that same sense of a family."

He smiled as he reminisced about a recent flight to Israel with his wife, Tahli, and baby, Laivy. "My wife just takes my son and just drops him off on some lady's lap, and three hours later in the flight, the lady brings him back to us. When you get on the plane to go to Israel and everyone on the plane is Jewish, it's just a different vibe completely."

Maybe living in Israel will make observant life a bit easier for the singer. "I won't be doing any concerts during the nine days [before Tisha b'Av, during which traditionally music is not performed to commemorate the destruction of the Temples]. Everyone always needs time off and time to do different things. With me, I just know which days I need off very far in advance," he said. "You can't perform every day of the year anyways."

Sometimes the pressure is on for Matisyahu to broadcast a certain message about Judaism or about life through his music.

"A lot of people tell me what they think, and I choose what I want to write about.

"I just try to represent what I know," he said.

Hamilton shul welcomes new rabbi

By ABIGAIL CUKIER
Special to the CJN

HAMILTON — Rabbi Dan Selsberg calls his move to Hamilton a successful "shidduch."

A friend suggested that Rabbi Selsberg, a recent graduate of the Conservative movement's Ziegler School of Rabbinic Studies at the University of Judaism in Los Angeles, would be a good fit with Beth Jacob Synagogue. A meeting was arranged and it was decided that Selsberg will become the rabbi of the Conservative synagogue next month.

Beth Jacob has been without a full-time rabbi for a year, since Rabbi Mark Biller, who led the congregation for six years, moved to New Jersey. After that, Julia Andelman, a rabbinical student, served as part-time spiritual leader for the fall and winter, flying in once a month.

Since last August, a team has worked to find a new rabbi and revitalize the shul.

"There are many small synagogues looking for an infusion of energy and struggling with demographic issues. Many have a defeatist attitude about the future," Rabbi Selsberg said. "Beth Jacob had an upbeat, positive response to the demographic issue. They saw that everybody could come together to change things, to make the synagogue a vibrant centre of conservative Judaism.

"That positive attitude is what really attracted me."

Rabbi Selsberg grew up in Kenosha, Wisc., and his wife Karen grew up in New Jersey. They have two-year-old twin boys.

"People ask why I would move from California. But where I grew up was not unlike Hamilton. In addition to the weather, it also had a lot of industry and a small Jewish population," Rabbi Selsberg said.

His love of, and talent for, learning history led him to become a teacher.

"I had a talent for working with people one on one and with groups, but as my Jewish learning deepened, it became clear that instead of being a public school teacher, my skills would be better lent to the rabbinate," he said.

"I want to serve a community, to serve God and to serve Jewish people in a deeper and more profound way."

Rabbi Selsberg visited Hamilton last month and led a Friday-night and a Saturday-morning service, as well as a teaching session, a social and a question-and-answer program.

"He is bright, passionate, funny. He has a lot of integrity as a human being," Wendy Schneider, Beth Jacob's co-president, said of the rabbi. "And his wife Karen, she is just a big an asset as he is. She was a youth director at a synagogue. She can read Torah. She chanted the Haftorah when they visited. It's a good match."

The year of transition for Beth Jacob has prompted many members to become leaders in various parts of shul life. Schneider wants that to continue.

"Rabbi Selsberg is a team player. He is committed to see the synagogue revitalize itself and is committed to have us do it with him, not on his own."

Rabbi Selsberg wants Beth Jacob to be a comfortable place for people of all ages.

"I want to see kids running around and young parents chasing after those kids," he said. "There are not a lot of places the generations can mix."

He wants the synagogue to offer programs such as movie nights, yoga classes and book groups, as well as children-and-parent programs in art and music. He also hopes to have children's programming on Shabbat morning, so all members of the family can have a rewarding service.

Schneider is also looking forward to more adult education and a revitalized Hebrew school.

"Now the real work starts," she said. "We want to offer choice to families, not just in the main sanctuary. There will be programs to appeal to different people at different stages of their lives."

Rabbi Selsberg said he's excited to work with people dedicated to the principles he holds sacred.

"I will provide services that are compelling and spiritual, with content that people respond to," he said. "This is something I look forward to building on for years to come."

JVS helps marginal youth start businesses

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

JVS Toronto's youth services division and York University's Advancing Canadian Entrepreneurship York (ACE York) have teamed up to enable seven youths in the Jane-Finch community to start new businesses.

They're doing it as part of the Ontario government's Summer Company program, which is funded by the Ministry of Economic Development and Trade and provides training and mentoring to students starting a full-time business over the summer before returning to school in the fall.

Deborah Lewis, director of JVS Toronto's youth services division, says the students were chosen out of a group of 35 who sent in proposed business plans.

Among the businesses chosen are an ethnic-specific dance camp, a website created to sell hand-painted T-shirts, a math tutoring business, and a company that installs garage doors.

If the students are successful in completing a number of tasks, including taking part in mentoring sessions and keeping a business journal, they will be given a $1,500 bonus at the end of the season.

Lewis, a social worker, says her division, an employment centre for youth ages 15 to 30, moved to the Jane-Finch community from Yonge Street and Sheppard Avenue about one year ago, "because it was an underserved area. There are youth services, but none that focused on employment. The goal of JVS is to move its services into areas in which they're needed, and they are clearly needed here."

Her centre offers a holistic approach to job seeking, she says. "We have a job developer, a counsellor to work with youth on probation or parole, and someone to teach them skills in retail and customer service."

There is a large immigrant population in the Jane-Finch area, and "although [most of them are anxious] to get jobs, they face a number of barriers. They may have no high school certificate, no computer skills, no job experience, and if they have children, they may have no one to look after them while they look for work," Lewis says.

"Many are also shy and lack the self esteem to say they need work. We have to draw it out of them. When they come here, they get a sense of fulfilment. They see that people care about them."

The centre's next endeavour is to offer babysitting services for single mothers, she says, "and we're looking into partnering with a college that offers early childhood education."

It's also looking to partner with schools in the area to help young people who have not completed high school, Lewis says.

Clients also have to learn about job maintenance, she says. "They need to learn about employers' expectations. It's one thing to get a job, but they also have to learn how to keep it.

"If youth don't have meaningful employment, they don't feel part of society. They get bored, and they could get caught up in the wrong activities."

Since her centre opened at the Jane-Finch Mall, Lewis says, about 3,000 youth have registered and received services.

Island Yacht Club dedicates new clubhouse

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

It was a festive afternoon as 300 members, guests, politicians and representatives of other local yacht clubs came to Mugg's Island for the official ribbon cutting of the Island Yacht Club's new clubhouse.

Father's Day, June 18, marked the second anniversary of the late-afternoon fire on Father's Day in 2004 that destroyed the club's historic clubhouse and its precious memorabilia collection.

"That fateful tragedy in 2004 marked the beginning of a new era in the history of the Island Yacht Club, now celebrating its 55th year of existence," said Cynthia Amsterdam, commodore of the Island Yacht Club (IYC).

The IYC was founded in 1951 by a small group of Jewish sailing enthusiasts at a time when Jews were denied membership in other Toronto yacht clubs. As elsewhere, the social climate in Toronto of the 1950s was less than welcoming to Jews.

Amsterdam, a partner in the law firm, Heenan Blaikie, has been sailing since she was 11 years old and spent many summers teaching at the club. She has competed locally, provincially and nationally.

"It is our collective love of our island retreat, the ambience, our beautiful grounds and our deep-rooted friendships – that's what makes the IYC a summer home and a close-knit community," Amsterdam said.

"That was the core of what has kept the IYC going over these past two difficult years," she told The CJN.

In her remarks at the ribbon cutting ceremony, standing on the steps of the new steel and glass clubhouse, she made special mention of vice-commodore Ron Kobrick, who, she said, "personally oversaw the entire planning and rebuilding of the new clubhouse, from the inception right through to the last nail being hammered into the deck."

The clubhouse's open concept blends dining, social and recreational spaces with an open area for lounging and quiet contemplation.

Several commodores from other yacht clubs spoke and presented memorabilia to the IYC to help the club start a new collection.

There was also an official flag-raising ceremony, and a miniature cannon, presented to the IYC by the Royal Canadian Yacht Club, was fired.

"We are overwhelmed by the outpouring of support from everyone here today," said Amsterdam, adding that "it is one of the high points in making our official opening such a success."

Berlin hosts interfaith soccer tourney

JTA

BERLIN — An interfaith youth soccer tournament was held late last month in Berlin.

The June 25 event, which included Jewish, Muslim and Christian children, was staged as the World Cup was being held in Germany.

"When I see Muslim kids running around in Berlin shouting, 'Go, Germany!' and waving the flag, I think it's great that they really feel a part of this society. And that's the way we Jews feel, too – we are at home in Germany," said Berlin cantor Avitall Gerstetter, who organized the event with local Turkish, Christian and non-religious groups for the second year in a row.

The Muslim team won the tournament.

Religion and comics

ARTS IN FOCUS
By Oren Shefa

In 2002, ending years of speculation, Benjamin Jacob Grimm conclusively revealed to the world that he is Jewish.

The former high school football star, turned U.S. Air Force test pilot, who hails from New York City, managed to live through 40 years of religious ambiguity before finally sharing his background with the world.

Grimm's religious outing became quite the sensation. Not only did it turn out that Jews could become football stars, but apparently they were also breaking into popular culture as mainstream comic book superheroes. Better known as The Thing, Grimm is instantly recognizable as the super-strong, orange-hued, rock-plated member of the Fantastic Four.

Created by Stan Lee and Jack Kirby in 1961, Ben Grimm was the not-so-loosely-based creation of artist Kirby, a Jew who grew up in tough neighbourhoods around the Big Apple. Both Kirby and Lee, who is also Jewish, never saw the sense of delving into the faiths of their creations. Lee especially felt that focusing on a character's religion would limit his appeal. "I wanted the stories to be palatable for readers of every type," he said.

Nonetheless, six years after Kirby's death, writers of the FF series decided to once and for all clarify Grimm's back story. The event was akin to discovering that the Green Lantern was really a Mormon or that Wolverine practised Buddhism. Sure, there have been Jewish superheroes in the past: The Seraph, an Israeli teacher adorned in the robes of Elijah, the ring of Solomon, the hair of Samson and brandishing the staff of Moses even fought alongside Superman, but characters like that were of interest to few people. The Thing, however, was and remains a hugely popular character with millions of fans around the world.

In recent weeks, clearly brought about due to the June 28 release of the hotly anticipated blockbuster Superman Returns, debates surrounding the faith of the son of Krypton have heated up with a number of groups clamouring to pronounce the most beloved superhero of all time as one of their own. Superman's Judaic links have been examined since the character's inception. A recent article on ABC News online highlighted similarities between Superman's narrow escape from his home planet and subsequent deliverance to Earth in a vessel to the story of Baby Moses plucked from the Nile, who would mature into the deliverer of the Jewish people. Other ties include Superman's Kryptonian name, Kal-El, which closely resembles the Hebrew words Kol El or Voice of God. Finally, like The Thing, Superman was created by a Jewish writing duo – Jerry Seigel and Canadian Joe Schuster.

Despite these and other connections, there is very little evidence to suggest that Superman clandestinely practised Judaism or any other faith for that matter. One of the greatest appeals of the comic book genre is the knowledge that superheroes are the protectors of all innocent men, women and children of all races, beliefs and backgrounds. Their one unifying constant has been their penchant for always taking the moral high road and fighting for those who cannot fight for themselves. For most renowned superheroes, religion has never been a precursor in the decision to battle evil, and as such has never played a part in their becoming the iconic beings we've come to know and love.

In a way, the absence of religious observance among superheroes is a breath of fresh air. In today's world, where religion has created more division than solidarity, it's nice to imagine that in some dimensions, even ones as fantastical as Metropolis, there are selfless beings hovering overhead whose motives revolve solely around aiding humanity in securing a safe, harmonious and peaceful coexistence.

Ve'ahavta: 10 years old!

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

How time flies. Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee is in its 10th year. Mazel tov.

It seems like only yesterday that we were planning our first medical mission to the rainforests of Guyana, from the basement of my place at Queen and Broadview. It feels like a blip of time has passed since Ve'ahavta joined a convoy of school buses going to El Salvador, loaded with humanitarian and relief items for five different villages. Now that was a mission! We not only delivered the items, but we left the buses there as well.

So a hearty mazel tov to all of us – the founders, volunteers, donors and clients, for bringing a unique gift to Canada's Jewish community, and ensuring a commitment to tikkun olam.

Ten years after Ve'ahavta's launch, it's truly amazing to look back at our programs and the way in which we have grown from a small non-profit to a full-blown movement.

Since Ve'ahavta was established in 1997, the organization has sent more than a dozen medical teams to Guyana, where our volunteers set up makeshift clinics in and around the rainforests. Some of our successes, in this the second poorest nation in the Western Hemisphere, includes the eradication of YAWS, a chronic infection that tends to strike children, affecting the skin and later the bones, as well as a potentially fatal vitamin A deficiency among children.

In Guyana, our team regularly holds Shabbat dinners. Many of Toronto's private Jewish schools, shuls and organizations have helped us secure resources for these missions, participating through tzedakah programs. Yom Huledet Samayach. Happy Birthday Ve'ahavta!

Ve'ahavta has sent volunteers to Zimbabwe to work at the Howard Hospital, a Salvation Army Hospital. Through a partnership with Sunnybrook Hospital, we have set up a TB as well as an HIV/AIDS clinic to help pregnant women with HIV/AIDS.

Ve'ahavta has published a number of academic studies. One of them, from research we conducted in Zimbabwe, shows that for $5 (Cdn) we could decrease transmission of HIV/AIDS from pregnant mother to child more than 50 per cent of the time. Ve'ahavta was also instrumental in bringing conjoined twins from Zimbabwe to Canada to undergo successful surgery separating the two at the Hospital for Sick Children.

Ve'ahavta's homeless program, launched through seed money provided by such philanthropists as Edward Bronfman and Milt Harris (rest in peace), has helped countless people living on or near the street. The department's agenda includes a powerful relationship with the Native Men's Residence (Na Me Res); an annual creative writing contest for the homeless; Passover seders for those "who are hungry"; and the opportunity for bar/bat mitzvah students and others to lend a hand on our homeless van.

Since our inception, Ve'ahavta has responded to crises in Sudan, Honduras, El Salvador, Cuba and Sri Lanka, often together with our American and Israeli counterparts. We have worked with Frontier College, a literacy organization, and University of Toronto's literacy program to assist Somalia children living in Regent Park through a homework program. Ve'ahavta has developed outstanding leadership – excellent Jewish community professionals – and worked with more than 1,000 volunteers.

Corporations and individuals have played a fundamental role in financing our programs. They include Apotex; Novopharm, Pharmascience, and Gamma-Dynacare, companies that have provided us with hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of pharmaceuticals and medical equipment.

On Dec. 31, Ve'ahavta will be 10. Throughout the year, we will mark this milestone with events and communications celebrating our existence and our having done our best to encourage all Jews to live up to our commitment of "never again" – our promise that Jews would not stand by when others were suffering the way we did during the Holocaust.

Happy Birthday Ve'ahavta! Thank you Canadian Jewish community for your support and joining us in our infancy and now as we approach our adolescence. We have done well. Yasher koach!

Olmert stands firm on Gaza

By DAN BARON
JTA

JERUSALEM — Two weeks into the biggest crisis he has faced as Israel's prime minister, Ehud Olmert appears determined to demonstrate that Israel is willing to stay in the Gaza Strip for now.

With little public progress in efforts to recover an Israeli soldier abducted by Palestinian gunmen on June 25, and troops and tanks waging a bloody sweep for Gaza rocket crews, Olmert on Sunday vowed more of the same.

"This is a war that cannot be put on a timetable," he told cabinet ministers. "We will press this campaign with calm and patience, mustering all the right means and preserving the proper discretion."

In tactical terms, the Gaza Strip campaign has scored points for Olmert.

Some 50 Palestinians, mostly combatants, have died, compared to one Israeli soldier likely killed accidentally by his comrades in northern Gaza. Despite censure from the European Union over "disproportionate force" by Israel, global outcry has been largely muted.

And while Cpl. Gilad Shalit remains captive somewhere in Gaza, the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority government, which at first distanced itself from his kidnapping, has as the military pressure mounts become more outspoken on the need to keep him alive and embrace diplomacy.

After days of intense Israeli military pressure, Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh proposed a truce on Saturday.

"To solve this crisis, we must return to the starting point, to calm, including an end to military actions on both sides," he said.

Olmert rejected the overture, just as last week he rejected a demand by Shalit's captors that hundreds of Palestinians jailed in Israel be freed.

"We will not negotiate with terrorists. We will not negotiate with Hamas. To do so would encourage more abductions," Olmert said.

But one of Olmert's closest allies

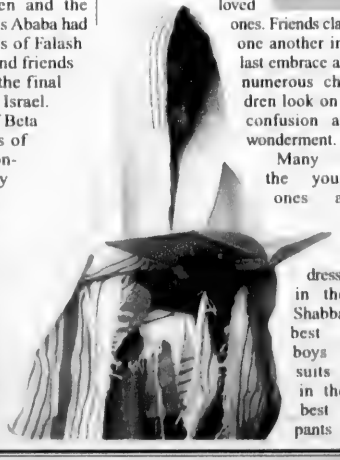
ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia — Well after night had fallen and the bustling streets of Addis Ababa had become still, hundreds of Falash Mora, their relatives and friends gather to prepare for the final leg of their journey to Israel.

The descendants of Beta Israel, the black Jews of Ethiopia, who had converted to Christianity over the past 100 years, say their final tearful farewells before leaving for Israel and reunification with their Jewish families.

Buses line up to ferry them to the city's international airport and trucks are piled high with their belongings suitcases mostly, and odd-looking oval contraptions used to make Ethiopians' unique bread-like staple, injera.

Some women wail as they say goodbye to loved ones. Friends clasp one another in a last embrace and numerous children look on in confusion and wonderment.



Many of the young ones are dressed in their Shabbat best boys in suits or in their best pants and shirts, girls wearing "princess" dresses suitable to the occasion.

On this night in late June, more than 200 Falash Mora board two flights to Israel. One is a regular flight organized by the government of Israel, the second a special charter hired by Toronto entrepreneur Walter Arbib, with financial support from businessmen Alex Shnaider, Nathan Jacobson and Arbib's Serbian associate Mike Trojanovic.

For Arbib, chartering the aircraft and accompanying the olim to Israel is half the reason he has come to Ethiopia.

Arbib, president and co-owner of SkyLink Aviation, with American partner Counterpart International, had earlier facilitated the shipment of badly needed AIDS pharmaceuticals to the Mother Teresa Orphanage in Addis Ababa, home to some 400 orphans afflicted with the HIV virus.

For both acts of charity, Arbib has deflected the credit to the Jewish communities where he has felt most at home — Toronto, where he lives, and Italy, which took him in when he and his family were forced to leave their native Libya after the Six Day War in June 1967.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Israeli Shot at Hotel

TORONTO — An Israeli Canadian man who was shot July 2 at a Toronto hotel in what police said was a botched drug deal was once jailed for using haredi Jews to smuggle ecstasy into the United States from the Netherlands. Sean Erez, 36, survived and was charged with drug possession and trafficking after police found four kilograms of cocaine hidden in an ice dispenser. Also charged were Erez's Israeli girlfriend Nataly Abitan, 27, of Montreal, and Evgene Starchik, 22, of B.C. In 2001, Erez, a Quebecer, was given 15 years in jail in New York in the ecstasy case. He later applied to serve his time in Canada, where he was paroled in 2005.

Hate Case in Court

OTTAWA — A London, Ont., skinhead was in Federal Court last week on charges that he posted racist Internet messages despite a court order not to do so. Tomasz Winnicki faces up to a year in jail for allegations by the Canadian Human Rights Commission that he posted 30 hate screeds on U.S. neo-Nazi sites between October and April, claiming the Holocaust was a hoax and that non-whites are criminally minded and intellectually inferior, Sun Media reported. He also faces jail time for previous alleged postings. In 2003, Ottawa lawyer Richard Warman filed a complaint with the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal, which heard the case last August. In October, Winnicki was ordered not to post more messages until the tribunal returned a decision.

Hearing For Accused

TORONTO — The man charged with second-degree murder in the killing of Alicia Ross was in a Newmarket, Ont., court last week for a preliminary hearing that was subject to a publication ban on evidence. Daniel Sylvester, 31, lived next door to Ross, 25, in Markham, a Toronto suburb. He turned himself in to police five weeks after she vanished last Aug. 17. Her remains were found north of Toronto.

Terrorist Says He's Too Sick To Leave Canada

HAMILTON — A Brantford, Ont., Palestinian man who was part of a 1968 hijacking of an Israeli airliner in Athens that left one Israeli dead has diabetes, hepatitis and heart problems that would worsen if he was deported to Lebanon, his lawyer said in his latest appeal to avoid removal.

Ottawa has been trying to deport Mahmoud Mohammad Issa Mohammad, a former member of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine who turns 64 this month, since 1988 for lying about his past in order to get into Canada.

In 1970, a Greek court sentenced him to 17 years for manslaughter and other offences, but he was granted a pardon and released four months later after another Palestinian terror squad hijacked a Greek airliner and demanded his release. He turned up in Canada in 1987, Canadian Press reported.

Mohammad lost his initial case, and a 2003 pre-removal risk assessment (PRRA) concluded he could be safely deported to Lebanon. In 2004, his lawyer, Barbara Jackman, appealed to the Federal Court of Canada, which ordered a new PRRA, but no decision on it has been made yet. His latest appeal could drag out his case for years, CP reported.

Jackman said last week that if Mohammad is deported to Lebanon, he would face harsh conditions in a refugee camp because he's a stateless Palestinian.

WORLD

Records Vault To Open

ROME — The Vatican will open archives covering the period 1922-1939, it said last week. The period covers the papacy of Pope Pius XI, and ends just before the ascendance of Pope Pius XII, who critics say turned a blind eye to Nazi treatment of Jews. But some papers could shed light on the activities of Pius XII when he was papal envoy to Germany and then the Vatican's secretary of state. Among other actions, he negotiated a treaty with Germany at the onset of Nazi rule and was believed to favour accommodation with the Nazis. The archives will be limited to scholars.

Rabbis Ban Smoking

NEW YORK — A committee of a centrist Orthodox rabbinical group said Jewish law is opposed to smoking. The halachah committee of the Rabbinical Council of America said the ruling is based on the value Judaism puts on health and scientific findings on the dangers of tobacco. It urges Jews to avoid or quit smoking.

Not Guilty Plea

FRESNO, Calif. — A Fresno high school teacher accused of beating a Jewish mother in 2005 has pleaded not guilty. Donna Jean Hubbard of Coarsegold, Calif., entered her plea to the hate crime charge last week. She allegedly pulled the hair of a mother of one of her students, kicked her and said she wished she burned in the Holocaust. Police closed the case after concluding they couldn't establish who started the fight, but reopened it this year after discovering Hubbard and her husband hosted a white supremacist rally.

CJPAC backs two anti-terrorism bills

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

If Josh Cooper has his way, the families of Canadian victims of terrorism may one day be able to sue foreign states that sponsor or harbour terrorists.

Josh Cooper

Cooper, executive director of the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC), has come out in support of pending legislation in Parliament designed to help Canadians fight terrorism.

If passed, Bills C-346 and S-218, sponsored respectively by B.C. Conservative MP Nina Grewal and Senator David Tkachuk, would enable Canadians to take legal action against the backers of terrorism.

"Today, Canadians have no recourse against sponsors of terrorism in Canadian courts," said Cooper, whose organization was launched last November, on the eve of the federal election.

"These bills enable the families of Canadian terror victims to launch civil suits against foreign countries and local sponsors of terrorism responsible for the death or injury of loved ones."

Cooper, who ran unsuccessfully as a Conservative party candidate in Thornhill in the 2004 federal election, said the bills could deter states and organizations from sponsoring terrorism and provide compensation to the victim's family.

He added that the private members' bills, apart from some minor technical differences, are essentially identical.

As for when they may become law, he said, "It can be a long road."

In the meantime, Cooper is pleased that at least two MPs from all major parties – Conservatives, Liberals, NDP and Bloc Quebecois – have rallied behind C-346, which was introduced last month.

"MPs realize that this is not a partisan issue," he said. "It's a Canadian issue."

Cooper urged Jewish Canadians to support the bills by lobbying their MPs and Minister of Public Safety Stockwell Day.

Meanwhile, they can visit CJPAC's website (www.cjpac.ca) to express support.

"In the end, if people don't speak out, the bills will likely not pass," he warned.

Cooper said that he and a friend, Danny Eisen, initiated the campaign to enact the bills.

"We have friends who lost a loved one to terrorism, and victims needed a voice," he explained.

In this spirit, Cooper and Eisen were instrumental in establishing the Canadian Coalition Against Terrorism (C-CAT) last year and organizing a community-wide event last month in which terrorism and radical Islam were condemned.

Cooper explained that CJPAC's mission is to advance and protect the interests of Canada's Jewish community and strengthen Canada's relationship with Israel by participating directly in the political process.

Asked whether CJPAC is not duplicating the work of either Canadian Jewish Congress or the Canada-Israel Committee, he said: "Although there are several community organizations that meet with government on the community's issues, they are funded by charitable dollars.

"So, while they can meet with elected officials to discuss their charitable purposes, these organizations cannot participate in elections or the political system on a partisan level. They simply cannot engage in partisan politics."

When murderers tell the truth

From the editor's desk

As these words are being written, the conflict between Israel and the Palestinian Authority has deepened into what appears now to be an unbridgeable chasm.

In their determination to bring more death into Israel's heartland, the Hamas-inspired Palestinians have launched their rockets into Ashkelon. This follows upon the unceasing barrage of more than 1,000 rockets that have been fired against the people of Sderot and nearby kibbutzim in the Negev Desert since Israel left the Gaza Strip last August, almost one year ago.

The rockets are the centrepiece of a campaign of war against Israel's people that includes unceasing efforts to send suicide bombers into Israeli cities and, last month, the killing of two IDF soldiers and the kidnapping of Cpl. Gilad Shalit near Kibbutz Kerem Shalom.

Even the Israelis who were most hopeful that the disengagement from Gaza might lead to a calmer coexistence between the two contending nations have become disillusioned. They too, have now lost their capacity for disbelief at the consistently malevolent decisions of the Palestinian people and their leaders.

Like noxious fumes that emanate from a failed chemistry experiment and suffocate the innocent, the disappointment felt by Israelis, not just the previously hopeful ones, has expanded to fill all the beakers in all the laboratories of the many missed opportunities for peaceful coexistence.

But now, disillusion, disbelief and disappointment commingle with anger and rage. (See the Perspectives essay by Larry Derfner in this issue.)

Rather than attempt to build a society in the Gaza Strip, the Palestinian Authority has used it as a staging ground for its war against Israel. Many Israelis were opposed to the unilateral withdrawal from Gaza for this very reason, citing the duplicity and unreliability of the Palestinian leadership. The grand strategists of Hamas have made prophets out of the disengagement opponents.

The attack against the military position near Kibbutz Kerem Shalom was an unprovoked, vicious violation of the sovereignty of another country. In former times, in other parts of the world, between other contending nationalities, such an attack, sanctioned and encouraged by the governing authority of one of the two sides, would have likely been a casus belli (an act that provokes war) in its own right.

The distressingly sad, indisputable fact about Israel's conflict with the Palestinians remains that the Palestinian leaders are singularly focused on targeting Jewish men, women and children for death. That is the overriding, overarching national purpose of the Hamas government and their ubiquitous supporters. That the toll of death and destruction in Israel from the rain of Palestinian rockets has not been greater owes more to the competence of the attackers than to their intention and overall aim.

Lest anyone harbour any illusions about Hamas' overall aim, Mousa Mohammed Abu Marzook, Hamas' political second-in-command, after Khaled Meshal, recently elaborated his movement's purpose to the German magazine Der Spiegel. He spoke with its correspondent Gabriella Keller in Damascus on June 30, five days after the attack against Kerem Shalom.

Der Spiegel*: Doesn't that [the signing of a protocol with Fatah approving the so-called Prisoners' Document] mean that Hamas inevitably accepts the Israeli state in the rest of that area?

Abu Marzook: The document does not say that at all. It is purely about the future of our people and about how a government uniting all Palestinian factions can work on building their independent state.

Der Spiegel: And does Hamas also believe that an Israeli state can exist alongside a Palestinian state?

Abu Marzook: Hamas has always said clearly: we will never accept the occupation, because it is not legal, not correct and not just… we insisted on including a paragraph that says that we will never recognize the legitimacy of the occupation…

Der Spiegel: Looking at the consequences [of Shalit's abduction], one has to recognize that violence against Israel will never really help the Palestinian people.

Abu Marzook: Of course such actions help. Because every Israeli now knows that there will always be a reaction to violence. If Palestinians are killed, Israelis will be killed. That should be clear to all Israelis.

Der Spiegel*: It is hard to imagine that approach would ever bring an end to reciprocal violence.

Abu Marzook: No matter what, the violence will not stop. We are on the weaker side and we do whatever we can. The Palestinians have no other choice.

Marzook's proud, boastful declarations are the window through which all of us can see the details of Hamas' national project: unending violence against Israel.

And like every other country on earth would do, Israel must and will defend itself against "the violence [that] will not stop." When murderers tell the truth we should listen.

Lalonde was also pictured in an accompanying photograph, standing to the left of Liberal MP Keith Martin. The CJN regrets the omissions.

Conservative movement faces 'daunting challenges'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Even if the Conservative movement approves the rabbinic ordination of gays and lesbians and opens the door to same-sex commitment ceremonies later this year, it will not necessarily affect shuls in Canada, says a Canadian lay leader of the denomination.

"My feeling is that there's a great deal of strength in various approaches, as long as there's a central theme of observance and halachah," said Paul Kochberg, president of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism's Canadian region, which encompasses Ontario and extends to the East Coast.

Paul Kochberg

With the possibility that several tshuvot (responsa) on the gay/lesbian issue will be accepted in a December vote by the movement's committee on Jewish law and standards, the body that sets halachic policy for the Rabbinical Assembly and the Conservative movement, Kochberg said that "our more traditional, non-egalitarian synagogues may choose to follow a tshuvah that says they will not accept clergy that are openly gay or lesbian, and will carry on as they have carried on before."

However, he added, some congregational leaders may ask themselves how they can continue to belong to a movement that is headed in a more liberal direction.

"It's not a simple issue," Kochberg said.

In an interview last month with The CJN, Rabbi Ismar Schorsch, who retired June 30 as chancellor of the movement's flagship Jewish Theological Seminary in New York, characterized the potential ordination of gays and lesbians as a loosening of the "halachic moorings" of Conservative Judaism.

Speaking at his shul last December, Rabbi Steven Saltzman of Adath Israel Congregation proposed the establishment of a Canadian "sovereignty association" within the Conservative movement that would agree to disagree with the American movement.

Rabbi Saltzman's suggestion came on the heels of the Conservative biennial convention in Boston, where Rabbi Menachem Creditor of Sharon, Mass., challenged the philosophy of halachic pluralism – an approach affirmed by movement leaders – when he said that it's immoral to allow non-egalitarian synagogues to be part of the Conservative movement.

Kochberg said there is a concern about where more traditional, non-egalitarian synagogues will find their rabbis if gays and lesbians are accepted for ordination.

Even now, many rabbinical students at the Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS) "will not interview, let alone serve, in congregations that will not consider all graduates on an equal footing," said Rabbi Wayne Allen, president of the Rabbinical Assembly, Ontario region. The result is that male rabbis, as well as female rabbis, may not consider working for a non-egalitarian congregation.

"We don't see a lot of [local synagogues] having a need for new rabbis in the very near future, but people are looking down the line," said Kochberg.

The situation is no different in non-egalitarian Conservative congregations in places such as New York, Philadelphia and New Jersey, he added.

In the United States, Kochberg said, there is a great fear that the gay/lesbian issue will split the movement, regardless of the outcome later this year. "There are going to be unhappy people on both sides of this decision."

Kochberg noted that there has been a slow evolution in Conservative synagogues in Toronto, where "more and more women are taking part in some aspect of the service."

Of the eight affiliated congregations in the GTA, only two are fully egalitarian. The rest are non-egalitarian or partially egalitarian.

Kochberg laments the fact that Conservative Judaism is often identified by what it isn't: not Orthodox, not Reform, but somewhere in the middle.

He prefers to focus on what it is. "No other movement or stream of Judaism addresses to my satisfaction the dichotomies that sometimes arise between social justice and strict interpretation of Torah," he said. On a personal level, he finds Conservative Judaism "positive" and "uplifting."

Other issues in the movement include the retirement of Rabbi Schorsch after 20 years as JTS chancellor, a position sometimes referred to as titular head of the Conservative movement. He is being replaced by Arnold Eisen of Stanford University, only the second non-rabbi to head the JTS in its 120-year history. Eisen has gone on record as being in favour of gay/lesbian ordination, but he defers to the rabbis for an actual decision.

Also, American Jewish demographics have changed: Reform Judaism is now the largest denomination in the United States – not Conservative Judaism, as was previously the case – and intermarriage has grown.

At least in Toronto, however, Conservative Judaism is the largest denomination, at 37 per cent of local Jews, said Rabbi Allen, citing a recent UJA Federation of Greater Toronto survey. "There are a number of congregations that are very strong here. Membership is stable if not growing… I think there is a sense of strength and optimism.

"At the same time," he said, "there is the realization that our congregations are aging, and that the cost of synagogue affiliation in full-service organizations has become more and more of a challenge for young people.

Kidney donor's decision changes friend's life

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Peter Seligman believes there are three fundamental things a person can give during their life – time, talent and treasure.

Looking at his own life, it is clear he is a man of his word.

Saving her from the imminent need for dialysis, Seligman's kidney has profoundly changed the course of Steinberg's health.

"Today, things are completely normal," she says.

"That's remarkable in and of itself."

"To me, I truly believe that I got the gift," says Seligman, 49.

Peter Seligman and Barbara Steinberg

While both are modest about the honour, Seligman says he looks forward not to hitting drives, but rather, driving the drink cart.

"I'm not a golfer, but by being in the refreshment cart, I get to shmooze with everybody," says Seligman, the owner of Seligman and Associates, an estate and insurance planning company in Toronto.

"That's really nice because it will give a sense of camaraderie."

Steinberg, 53, initially had her kidney operated on at the age of six, but kidney disease did not significantly present itself until the 1990s.

By 2005, doctors stressed the need for a transplant.

When Seligman learned about the transplant situation, he instinctively offered to help.

"I was very proactive about being a donor and I would have been very disappointed had I not had the opportunity," says the father of three, who is no stranger to important causes, ranging from fundraising for Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), to donating blood a staggering 140 times.

Seligman's proactive approach proved to be quite fateful.

Steinberg was not in a rush to have the transplant and would have likely waited longer had Seligman not persisted. But waiting would have had dire consequences, as the condition of Steinberg's kidney plummeted severely the day before surgery.

"Had surgery been delayed or had I not had a donor, [dialysis] would have the next step," says the mother of three.

"That's why I'm so lucky because most people who have kidney disease are on dialysis for years. Their lives are turned upside down by it."

It is estimated that two million Canadians either have kidney disease or are at risk of it.

The disease is on the rise, though it is treatable.

In less than three hours from the time Seligman went into surgery, his kidney was already in Steinberg.

She was out of the hospital six days later and back at work as a psychotherapist within a month.

"Although I am so deeply appreciative for the way things have worked out for me… I am also aware of so many people with kidney disease in our own community whose stories are filled with so much pain, sadness and isolation," Steinberg says.

"It is my hope that Peter's unparalleled act of giving will inspire others to give in whatever ways they can."

For more information, visit www.kidney.ca or call 416-445-0373.

Kochberg addresses intermarriage issue

"There are daunting challenges, and I'm only scratching the surface."

Kochberg said intermarriage "has not surfaced as quite as large an issue" as in the United States. "But certainly it is an issue, and I think more and more Canadian congregations are going to be addressing it."

To the best of his knowledge, Toronto's Beth Tikvah Congregation is the only Conservative synagogue in Canada that has a formal program for intermarried couples and their families.

Kochberg noted that contrary to what many people perceive, Canadian Conservative congregations are "not monolithically non-egalitarian." He corrected himself when he started to use the word "traditional," noting that egalitarians also consider themselves to be traditional.

"Eastern Canada has a whole range of synagogues from fully egalitarian to fully non-egalitarian," he said. "That's what pluralism [within the Conservative movement] is all about, and it's working really well in this region."

As to what will happen in the future, Kochberg said he doesn't know. "I can't project what the reaction will be [to the December vote], but I'm hoping it will be calm and people will look at the decision, whatever it is, with intelligence and serenity, and evaluate how it's going to impact on them personally and on their own communities."

A test for the West too

More than two weeks after Israel Defence Forces Cpl. Gilad Shalit was kidnapped from Kerem Shalom in the Negev and two of his colleagues were killed, his murderous abductors – and their supporters – still preferred to bring about large-scale military confrontation with Israel rather than return the soldier to his family.

As of this writing, some 51 Palestinians have been killed and 180 injured in fighting with the IDF. But the kidnappers and the Hamas government that encourages them are unmoved by the spilling of blood and the waste of human life. Indeed, it is the moving sidewalk of their credo, the long, blood-stained road of their journey to freedom and independence.

And according to the dismaying results of a poll conducted on July 7 and 8 by the Jerusalem Media and Communication Center (JMCC) among Palestinians of the West Bank and Gaza, they do not travel alone.

Fully 77 per cent of those questioned supported the kidnapping of Shalit, and about 67 per cent said they would support even more kidnappings. Some 69 per cent believe Shalit should be released only in an exchange for Palestinian prisoners held in Israeli jails.

If the results of the JMCC poll suggest that the violent, anti-Israel Hamas ideology has taken root in Palestinian society, the outlook is bleak indeed for peaceful, co-operative coexistence in this generation between Israelis and Palestinians. For the Hamas ideology is in lock step with radical, fundamentalist Islam as practised by Islamic Jihad, Hezbollah, Al Qaeda and the rulers of Iran.

Indeed, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad vociferously joined the fray last Friday in an anti-Israel rally in Tehran when he threatened that Israel's actions in the Gaza Strip could set off an "explosion" in the Islamic world.

Without subtlety and without any shame, he threatened the West as well as Israel. "They [Israel's western supporters] should not let things reach a point where an explosion occurs in the Islamic world," Ahmadinejad said. "If an explosion occurs, then it won't be limited to geographical boundaries. It will also burn all those who created [Israel] over the past 60 years."

And of course, the Iranian Republic's ruler used the occasion to once again make plain his intentions for the Jewish state: "This is a fake regime... it won't be able to survive. I think the only way [forward] is that those who created it [the West], take it away themselves."

It is thus imperative that Israel show the firmest resolve in dealing with Hamas. Much like the psychological and strategic advantage the Iranian Ayatollahs won over U.S. president Jimmy Carter when they perceived American weakness in the face of the Iranian hostage taking some 27 years ago, Hamas and its fellow travellers will pounce upon any apparent or perceived lack of Israeli decisiveness. But it is not Israel alone being tested. As the Iranian president told the world last week, it is the entire democratic West.

Yitzhak (Antek) Zuckerman, one of the leaders of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, was buried at his home, Kibbutz Lohamei Hagetaot, which he helped co-found after the war in an area north of Haifa. He died June 17, 1981, at age 66. Israel's president, Yitzhak Navon, and other public figures joined former anti-Nazi fighters at his funeral.

Youth with a project

The United Nations has called it "the worst humanitarian crisis in the world." The United States has officially declared it genocide. An estimated 400,000 people have been killed, 2.5 million have been displaced, and countless more victims have been raped and mutilated. Recent peace deals have not succeeded in stopping the violence.

Everyone with a conscience feels that something must be done about the situation in Darfur. Unfortunately, for many people, guilt rarely turns into action. There are people, however, who are not satisfied with merely shaking their heads at the tragedy in Darfur. Interestingly, a strong voice is being heard from the youth population. These future global citizens are not content to idly sit by.

In Toronto, the youth call to action is being headed by Project Equity, an organization founded by and made up of public and private school students of various denominations. Co-director Assaf Weisz says, "There is an incredibly untapped abundance of socially and politically transformative energy within youth. Our challenge to ourselves and to everyone is to get those wheels of political will rolling."

On April 30, Project Equity organized a rally in Toronto to coincide with rallies throughout North America – to show their support for the victims in Darfur and to show their opposition to the government's apathy. More than 1,000 people attended. High-profile speakers and politicians from all federal parties shared the podium.

With the growing interest among students in alleviating the situation in Darfur, Project Equity has expanded. Co-director David Berkal describes the organization as "an outlet for youth to express social activism. By breaking the stereotype that youth are apathetic, we choose to directly affect the world we will soon inherit."

The leaders of Project Equity aim to increase the awareness raised by the rally. They are currently planning future projects, including hosting a "party in the park" in September, to encourage youth empowerment and to raise awareness about global issues. ## Strong, united Jewish student voice

For Jewish university students in this country, it is, as Charles Dickens wrote in A Tale of Two Cities, the best of times and the worst of times. I say this because, despite the vehement anti-Israel rhetoric that has become mainstream on many of our nation's campuses, a proud, strong and united Jewish voice has emerged.

With an estimated 30,000 Jewish post-secondary students across the country, this is no small feat. Surely, we do not all agree – certainly not all the time. Canada is a nation with vastly different regions representing exceedingly different constituents. Western Canada and Eastern Canada often seem to be worlds apart; and Orthodox and Reform traditions sometimes seem like polar opposites, rather than slight variations. As the Jewish tradition teaches us, we accept these differences and we embrace the challenges that plurality provides. When all is said and done, regardless of where we stand geographically, religiously or even politically, Canadian Jewish students stand with Israel.

Over the last few months, delegates from universities and colleges across the country have elected the new executive of the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students. The 2006-07 CFJS executive comprises: Melissa Lantsman (president); Jay Solomon (vice-president, external); Daniel Pink (vice-president, internal); Sarah LaFreniere (vice-president, finance); and Isaac Apter (vice-president, programming). In addition, the board includes members-at-large Kira Driliuk, Eva Zucker and Kyle Lichtman, as well as committee chairs David Belous, Corey Sheffman, Jennifer Eidelman, Alex Halpern, Tamar Katz and Jeff Justiz.

Building on the successes of the past, and with the generous support of our community partners, we look forward to serving the Jewish students of Canada this year.

CJC's advocacy roots

I could not agree more with the sentiment Gerald Gall expressed in his column "CJC must return to its advocacy roots" (CJN, June 22).

In recent years, Canadian Jewish Congress has suffered considerably from a decrease in its budget for advocacy activities. Whether this has been from neglect or from an intentional desire to limit CJC's activities is irrelevant. The fact is that CJC is not being given the funds required to do the job and the community has suffered as a result.

I hope that there are more people who feel the way Gall feels.

Giving up on the Palestinians

By LARRY DERFNER
Jerusalem Post

None of the recent kidnappings, bombings and killings would be going on now if the Palestinians hadn't welcomed Israel's exit from Gaza – settlers and soldiers – with only more rockets aimed at Israeli civilians.

If the Palestinians had taken last summer's disengagement as a confidence-building measure and responded in kind by suspending attacks, instead of taking it as a sign of weakness that vindicated those attacks, things could have been different.

If someone had told me in the 1980s or 90s that Israel would one day get out of Gaza, I would have predicted that this would definitely soften the Palestinians' attitude and that it would bring the two sides closer together.

I would have said the same thing if someone had told me Israel would one day offer the Palestinians 100 per cent of Gaza and 97 per cent of the West Bank, including much of Arab east Jerusalem, in peace negotiations

But by the time Israel left Gaza, I realized the Palestinians – as a whole, not Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and other powerless moderates – would conclude from this that terror works, and go out to do more. By last summer, I looked to Israel Defence Forces retaliations, not territorial concessions, to bring Israel peace. I still do on the border with Gaza, and one day on the border with a post-occupation West Bank.

I still believe what I've always believed that Israel has no right to rule the Palestinians, that ruling them is bad, not good, for Israeli security, so it's both immoral and impractical for Israel to gobble up the only territory the Palestinians have for their own

However, the belief I've lost is that the Palestinians are basically a rational, reasonable nation, that they can be talked into putting down their weapons and making peace with Israel – if not out of goodwill, then out of their own self-interest.

What I believe now is that only Israeli military deterrence, which will no doubt require the periodic use of force, can get the Palestinians to stop fighting.

My disillusionment with them began after the 2000 Camp David talks, but not because they didn't accept Israel's offer. They had no obligation to accept it, and refusing it didn't make them into warmongers. What appalled me, instead, was how triumphant former PA president Yasser Arafat and the Palestinians were after the talks failed.

"Saladin" they were calling Arafat as they carried him on their shoulders. The Israeli peace camp was stunned and trying not to despair, while our "partners" were exultant.

After the intifadah got under way, what embittered me was not that the Palestinians had gone to war. Tension was high after Camp David, and after Ariel Sharon and 1,000 cops went up to the Temple Mount, a riot ended with a half-dozen Palestinians dead.

I could understand a spasm of rage lasting a week or two. But what blighted my view of the Palestinians was that the intifadah didn't stop, because they were having too glorious a time killing and dying. For them it wasn't the tragedy that former U.S. president Bill Clinton and the Europeans were moaning over. It was the greatest thing they'd ever done. They just got crazier and crazier.

(Again, Abbas and a few others spoke out against the terror from the beginning, but they didn't count.)

At the same time came another source of disillusionment. After the intifadah began, the Palestinians themselves declared proudly that their role model was Hezbollah. As with the disengagement from Gaza, they'd welcomed Israel's withdrawal from Lebanon as a "prize for terror" instead of a signal that Israel was serious about peace. (Unlike those who still regret that the IDF left Lebanon, I don't think this was the catalyst for the intifadah, but only one of many.)

Finally, what caused me to give up on the Palestinians was watching Arafat in action, without giving him every benefit of every doubt, but rather just taking him at face value. What a gargoyle, what a caricature of a corrupt, violent, temperamental, megalomaniacal dictator. The one time I saw him in person was in early 2001 at his Muqata compound in Ramallah, when then-U.S. secretary of state Colin Powell came to visit, and, after addressing Powell as "general," he smiled that hideous smile of his and said, "But then, I am a general too." And all his lackeys in the hall exploded in laughter at his legendary wit.

> 'The character of Arafat wasn't incidental to the national character of the Palestinians, it was a reflection of it'

This was the symbol of the Palestinian people. This was their leader, their inspiration, since 1969. The character of Arafat wasn't incidental to the national character of the Palestinians, it was a reflection of it, which is a very depressing realization.

So why are they like this? Because they're Arabs, because they're Muslims, because they're a nation of the Middle East? No, not at all. We've made peace with Egypt. We've made peace with Jordan. The other Arab countries may not like us, but they're not fighting us.

> 'Israel is determined to separate from them, while Egypt and Jordan are even more determined to stay separate from them'

Look at what's been going on in this crisis with Gaza: while the Palestinians are being the Palestinians, Egypt has objectively taken Israel's side. Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak tried to broker a prisoner exchange for the kidnapped soldier Gilad Shalit that I'm sure Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert would have gone for, but this meant, of course, that Hamas and its partners never would have considered it. (The deal was for Israel to release prisoners due to be released within the year anyway, in return for Shalit.)

Right after the kidnapping, Egypt put 2,500 soldiers along the border with Gaza in order to keep the kidnappers from smuggling Shalit into Sinai, and to keep masses of Palestinians from stealing into Sinai themselves.

So the Palestinians' problem isn't that they're Arab or Muslim. It's not that they don't accept Israel's right to exist as a Jewish state in the Middle East – what Arab or Muslim around here does? But other Muslims aren't fighting Israel over it. Only the Palestinians are.

The difference, the thing that's unique about the Palestinians in this region, is that they alone have had to build their nation in direct competition with a people that runs circles around them at nation-building. The other Arabs can hate Israel and go on with their lives. The Palestinians can't. The other Arabs can forget their losses in war to Israel. Their countries are intact. The Palestinians' losses in war to Israel have left their country in pieces, and themselves scattered. They live with the results of their war losses to Israel every day.

Nobody wants them for neighbours, either. Israel is determined to separate from them, while Egypt and Jordan are even more determined to stay separate from them.

This is another belief I've lost: the possibility of a "viable" Palestinian state. With whom for leaders - Hamas and the Army of Islam, and Islamic Jihad and al-Qaida? With half the state in the West Bank and the other half in Gaza, with nothing but "Keep Out" signs in the middle and all around?

I still think that Israel, because of its military superiority over the Palestinians, will one day leave the West Bank and live more or less in peace. But even if and when this conflict ends, or at least winds down happily for Israel, I don't see a happy anything in store for the Palestinians.

Stepping out of the shadows

At first glance, any book with the title Man in the Shadows would seem to prime its readers for an adventure into territories unknown and tales not yet told. Name as its author a former director of the Mossad and the volume becomes even more enticing.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

However, for anyone who has met Efraim Halevy or heard him speak – a privilege I enjoyed earlier this year, well before his book was published – it would come as no surprise that Man in the Shadows (St. Martin's Press, 2006) unfolds without pretence or fanfare. Self assured, dignified, and articulate, Halevy comes across as one who adroitly avoids hyperbole, melodrama and sensationalism, thus dispelling any possible expectation that his book might turn out to be titillating, controversial or in any way critical of the intelligence community.

Illustrated with many of his personal experiences, Man in the Shadows provides a first hand, thoughtful and objective account of recent Israeli history, focusing primarily on events between 1990 and 2003. These integral 13 years, in Halevy's estimation, "have changed the face of the world and have catapulted us into a new and frightening era."

In his opening chapter, he reflects on the unprecedented events of Sept. 11, 2001, which he remembers as a day that consumed him with "a feeling of almost total helplessness." Fittingly, however, the book draws to a close with the author expressing not helplessness, but a complex appraisal of what needs to be done to thwart "an enemy that has strategic planetary goals and clearly defined strategies designed to reach those goals."

Halevy has no doubt that the free world is currently engaged in "World War III," with the Islamic terrorist movement as its ruthless adversary.

As deputy director, and later director, of the Mossad, Halevy worked closely with, and was confidant to, a succession of Israeli prime ministers. What comes across as most fascinating within the context of these relationships is not so much the expected collaboration between senior politicians and the Mossad leadership on security matters, but the less well-known function of the intelligence community in brokering pacts between nations. This is nowhere better demonstrated than in the very substantial role that Halevy himself is known to have played in forging the historic peace agreement between Jordan and Israel.

Other insights into the diverse involvements of the Mossad chief permeate the text from cover to cover, providing a perspective that goes well beyond the mundane and delves into the often delicate interface between diplomacy, described by Halevy as "the art of the possible," and intelligence, which he calls "the craft of the impossible." The conclusion is that both have become increasingly important in today's sophisticated and dangerous world.

Israel's familiar dilemma

The continuing rocket fire from Gaza into southern Israeli towns, as well as the recent Palestinian incursion and kidnapping of an Israeli soldier, confront our country with an all-too-familiar dilemma: what measures are we to adopt in trying to protect our population from enemies with much lower standards of conduct while not, in the process, sacrificing our souls?

Ross Culiner in Jerusalem

For even in our present difficulties, our civilians regularly subjected to unprovoked assault, we must never fail to keep our hearts as well as our heads. As more and more voices call for revenge and retribution, it's vital that we continue to factor into our military thinking ongoing evaluations of the moral price the Jewish state can afford to pay when defending itself.

There is certainly no justification, after our complete withdrawal from Gaza, for the Palestinian aggression, some of which is endorsed, if not sponsored, by the elected Hamas government itself. That does not mean, however, that an unlimited retaliatory response is warranted. It goes without saying that from a strictly military standpoint, the challenge is relatively minor. With our overwhelming firepower we could quickly turn the Gaza Strip into a living hell, something that would silence the guns and rocket launchers for the foreseeable future. But should we?

The temptation to do so exists. We all feel outraged and betrayed. And when my niece's school took a direct hit from a Qassam rocket yesterday, my own initial impulse was to support unleashing all hellfire against the perpetrators.

But we must constantly remind ourselves, especially in times of crisis, that we want to remain a civilized society. And as a consequence severe limitations are placed on our available modes of response in situations not strictly defined as ones of "life and death". Compassion must figure into our every calculation, even when this erects nearly insurmountable hurdles for the Israel Defence Forces.

Our present failure to thwart the missile attacks illustrates the point well. We are battling unbridled aggression with one hand tied behind our backs to avoid causing unnecessary and widespread harm to innocent Palestinian bystanders. Most effective, no doubt, would be to strike massively at targets wherever they are, crowded urban centres not excepted. This would certainly bring tremendous local pressure to bear on the terrorists in their midst. But we cannot, in good conscience, do such a thing, which is why we simply have no choice but to muster all the persistence and ingenuity that we Israelis are famous for in seeking alternative solutions to our woes.

The daily scenes on our TV screens of terrified and teary-eyed parents clutching their children close to their breasts as the rockets thud in the background constitute a heart-wrenching and infuriating spectacle. The desperate appeals to politicians to take the requisite steps to end their torment is perfectly understandable. But it does not follow that our government ought to adopt a policy of brutal and indiscriminate retaliation, which though militarily expedient, would be morally unacceptable. We must resist, at all costs, stooping to the tactics of our adversaries. For not to resist would sound the death knell of the kind of Israel we want.

Even if Israel's actions were not subject to the continuous and close scrutiny of the international community – the recent Gaza beach family tragedy being one prominent example – prudence and the respect for all human life, Palestinian included, must always remain the cornerstone of our ethos. There are times when we must bite our tongues, stay our trigger fingers and pay a dear price for it. In so doing, however, we are saving our souls. Alas, character is tested in extreme adversity, under stress, not when it is convenient to behave nicely.

However awful things now appear, and must undoubtedly be, for the residents of Sderot, let us nevertheless remember that not a single resident has lost his or her life, in spite of everything, since the Israeli pull-out from Gaza 10 months ago. This is no bloodbath. There are critical periods when we Israelis must show fortitude and courage, and be willing, to some extent, to endanger our own blood in order to keep it clean and know with full confidence that we are good.

Culiner@netvision.net.il

Palestinians choose war - again

The hopes for a Palestinian transformation following the Israeli withdrawal from Gaza in August 2005 have been blasted to bits once again.

The opportunity that opened up after the removal of civilians, checkpoints and army bases was never explored. In the 10 months between the Israel Defence Forces' exit and its return last month, the missile attacks and terror efforts never really ended. And the anarchy of Palestinian society in Gaza only got worse under the Hamas-led pseudo-government.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

The arguments in favour of the Gaza pullout remain valid – primarily in terms of demographics and public relations. By withdrawing its presence from Gaza completely, the Israeli government expected that the "international community" would declare the occupation, and the responsibility for the welfare of the population, to be over. But the dangers of this move, particularly in terms of the security costs, were underestimated by then-prime minister Ariel Sharon and the government.

The post-disengagement security model was based on the assumption, or naïve hope, that Palestinian security forces, Egyptian border troops and monitors from the "international community" would provide the substitutes for an Israeli military presence. But the warheads of the Qassams and the anti-tank missiles fired in the recent attack were brought in under their noses – or perhaps their feet.

The main element in this plan was the expectation that the Palestinians would change course. U.S. President George W. Bush called on the Palestinians "to fight terrorism, dismantle terrorist organizations, and prevent the areas from which Israel has withdrawn from posing a threat that would have to be addressed by any other means." The Europeans (and some Canadian officials in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and International Trade) talked about helping moderate and pragmatic Palestinians build a new relationship with Israel.

But these hopes went nowhere. As the Israelis left, the Palestinians extended the terrorist infrastructure into abandoned greenhouses, schools and houses. A few months later, Hamas took over, pledging to eradicate Israel and escalating the attacks. And the diplomatic gains did not materialize Israel is still blamed for the plight of Gazans.

At the same time, responsibility for the 13-kilometre long Philadelphi Corridor was turned over to Egypt, under the eye of the U.S.-led Multinational Force and Observers. The Egyptians were supposed to stop the Palestinians from digging tunnels for use in smuggling explosives, terrorists and anti-tank and even anti-aircraft missiles.

Shortly after this agreement, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice brokered a separate security arrangement covering the Rafiah crossing. Last Nov. 15, Rice knocked heads together, and Sharon agreed to allow Palestinian control of this border zone, accompanied by a European Union monitoring mission to insure implementation of the prohibition on the entry of weapons and terrorists. This effort was also a response to the pressures on the United States from Javier Solana, the European Union's high representative for the common foreign and security policy, and James Wolfensohn, who was the international Quartet's special envoy in Gaza.

But these were empty words, and after paying a high price, Israel has rediscovered the fundamental need for direct control over its frontiers. After relying on Egypt and Europe, it has no choice but to resume direct control over Gaza's borders. The lessons of the failed disengagement will also be applied elsewhere, and, in addition to maintaining full security control to the east of the separation barrier, Israel will need to maintain tight control over the Jordan Valley.

The bottom line is that the only condition under which Israel can transfer security responsibility, in any sector, is after the Palestinians have finally ended their war.

Until then, short cuts to security and meaningless "international guarantees" will lead to even more violence and death – for both Israelis and Palestinians.

The Kirshner File

Israel's incursion into Gaza was inevitable

Israel's limited but expanding ground and air offensive in the Gaza Strip, which may yet escalate into a full-blown invasion with all its ramifications, was inevitable.

The incursion, the first major one since Israel's unilateral withdrawal from Gaza last summer, was launched on June 27 after the armed wing of Hamas, in league with two other Palestinian groups, attacked a military outpost near Gaza, killed two Israeli soldiers and kidnapped a third, Gilad Shalit, who remains missing.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The kidnapping, the first incident of its kind in 12 years, was only one of the reasons why Israel stormed into Gaza. Beyond freeing Shalit, Israel wants to end the reign of terror caused by the firing of Qassam rockets into its towns and settlements adjacent to Gaza and to weaken the Hamas government, which is committed to Israel's destruction.

Since Israel's pullout from Gaza 10 months ago, the border area has slipped into a state of turbulence. Islamic Jihad and the Popular Resistance Committees, two of the most radical organizations in the Palestinian camp, have fired scores of Qassams at Sderot and neighbouring kibbutzim, exacting several deaths, as well as property damage.

Last week, as Israeli armour pushed deeper into northern Gaza after invading southern Gaza, Hamas operatives fired a Qassam into the empty parking lot of a high school in Ashkelon – the largest Israeli city in the vicinity in what Prime Minister Ehud Olmert described as "an escalation of unprecedented gravity." The rocket was launched from the ruins of an abandoned Israeli settlement.

Palestinian gunners have previously targeted the outskirts of Ashkelon, hitting a beer factory and a cemetery, as well as strategic sites such as a power plant and an oil pipeline. But the strike inside Ashkelon, which underscored the inability or the unwillingness of the Palestinian Authority to prevent attacks of this magnitude, was on an altogether different scale.

If the Palestinians can hit Ashkelon once, they can hit it again, as they did after the initial strike. And if Qassams can reach Ashkelon, a distance of about 12 kilometres from the launch site, Israel has a huge problem on its hands. If Palestinians can smuggle Qassams into the West Bank, or manufacture rockets there, they can threaten Israel's coastal plain, including Tel Aviv and Ben-Gurion Airport.

Palestinians have already tried to smuggle Qassam components into the West Bank, but their efforts have been foiled. If they succeed in firing Qassams from the West Bank, the consequences would be calamitous in terms of Israel's fierce reaction. In the meantime, Palestinian technicians are working day and night to increase the range and effectiveness of the Qassam, and the day may yet come when it will be more than simply a crude projectile.

Israel hoped that its departure from Gaza would concentrate Palestinian minds on internal affairs and encourage Hamas – which defeated Fatah in last January's legislative election in the Palestinian autonomous areas – to continue observing the 18 month-old ceasefire, such as it was. But this was not to be. Islamic Jihad and like-minded groups, which never accepted the truce, have fired more than 600 Qassams at Israel since last September, when the Israeli army pulled out of Gaza. Mahmoud Abbas, the president of the Palestinian Authority, has condemned the Qassam firings, but to no avail.

In the face of these attacks, and attempted border infiltrations by heavily armed gunmen, Israel took calibrated steps to warn the new Hamas government – which refuses to recognize the Jewish state, renounce violence or agree to observe previous agreements signed by the Palestinian Authority – that the status quo would not be tolerated.

On April 13, just days before an Islamic Jihad suicide bomber killed nine Israeli civilians in a Tel Aviv suicide bombing, the deadliest since 2004, Israeli troops crossed into Gaza for the first time since last summer's disengagement to examine the spot where two armed Palestinians trying to sneak into Israel had been killed. The depth of Israel's penetration was only about 100 metres, but the message was clear.

On May 23, Israel arrested a senior Hamas leader in Ramallah accused of having planned assaults that resulted in the deaths of 78 Israelis. And less than a week later, Israel ambushed and killed three Islamic Jihad members in Gaza preparing to fire a Qassam.

All the while, Israel fired thousands of artillery rounds at potential Qassam launching sites. In a few cases, Arab civilians were accidentally killed by stray shells – fuelling yet more anger and bitterness among the Palestinians, and prompting Hamas to cancel the tattered ceasefire on June 10.

Apart from these strictly military measures, Israeli generals ratcheted up the rhetoric by threatening to invade Gaza, while Defence Minister Amir Peretz warned that Israel's patience was wearing thin. But as late as May, the chief of staff, Gen. Dan Halutz, suggested that an invasion would be "futile" and embroil Israel in a Lebanon-like quagmire. What he may have meant is that previous Israeli raids to shut down the Qassams failed.

In an effort to control terrorism, Israel also periodically closed border crossings, which enable Palestinian workers to commute to jobs and permit the flow of vital necessities, from food to medical supplies, into Gaza. But in closing these crossings, Israel inadvertently worsened Gaza's miserable economic situation and exacerbated the growing humanitarian crisis there.

Prior to sending troops and tanks into Gaza, Israel claimed that Hamas was directly responsible for firing Qassams at Sderot and for suppling Islamic Jihad and the Popular Resistance Committees with such rockets.

Khaled Mashal

These suspicions were fed by the comments of two top-ranking Hamas officials. Saeed Seyam, the Palestinian interior minister, said that he would not order the arrest of militants attacking Israel. And in the wake of the suicide bombing in Tel Aviv in April, Hamas spokesman Sami Abu Zuhri declared, "The resistance is a legal and natural reaction to… Israeli crimes, and the Palestinian people have a right to defend themselves."

These provocative statements were somewhat tempered by Ismail Haniya, the Hamas prime minister, who called for an end to "a whirlpool of blood," and by Ahmed Yusef, Haniya's political advisor, who asserted that attacks against Israel do not serve Hamas' fundamental interests.

Israel, which has boycotted the Hamas government and has successfully urged countries like United States and Canada to follow its lead, does not distinguish between such nuances in Hamas' policy. As far as Israel is concerned, Hamas is dedicated to its destruction and replacement by an Islamic state in all of historic Palestine.

In line with this view, Israel has arrested about one third of the Hamas cabinet, bombed Haniya's office and the ministry of interior, and destroyed Gaza's sole power plant.

Israel has also rejected the so-called Prisoner's Document, which is supported by Fatah Abbas' party – and, most recently, by Hamas as well. Drafted by prominent Palestinians in Israeli jails, it espouses a two-state solution within the context of a full Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank, the right of Palestinians to resist Israel's occupation and the right of Palestinian refugees to return to their former homes in what is now Israel.

The proposal was last conveyed by Haniya in May, when he said, "If Israel withdraws to the 1967 borders, peace will prevail and we will implement a hudna for many years. Our government is prepared to maintain a long-term ceasefire with Israel." Haniya's aide, Yusef, made a similar offer 11 days before Shalit's disappearance, suggesting that Hamas was ready for a 50-year truce.

In a broader vein, Moussa Abu Marzouk, the deputy head of Hamas' political bureau in Damascus, has said that Hamas would consider a 2002 Arab League two-state peace plan if Israel accepts it first. But Israel opposes it.

At the end of the day, Hamas has not changed its stripes.

Marzouk has said that Palestinian recognition of Israel, taken during the first phase of the now-defunct Oslo process, was a mistake and "must be corrected." Marzouk's boss, Khaled Mashal, the object of an Israeli assassination attempt in 1997, has said, "Hamas will not recognize Israel. We will not give legitimacy to occupation." In keeping with Hamas' charter, Mahmoud Zahar, the Hamas foreign minister, recently told a Chinese news agency that "there is no place for Israel on this land."

Comments such as these explain why Israel's current offensive in Gaza – not the first nor the last – is not just about a 19-year-old captured soldier, but far more about the intentions of a hostile Palestinian government that will not leave Israel in peace.

Torah is an instruction book for life, Prager says

By JESSICA FREIMAN
CJN Intern

If Judaism can't thrive in total freedom, it doesn't deserve to survive, according to author and radio personality Dennis Prager.

Speaking at a tribute to the late Lubavitcher Rebbe, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, Prager, a self-described non-denominational Jew, said that rational, intellectual reasons must exist for identifying as Jewish.

"If we need anti-Semites to keep us Jewish, we [Jews] are not worthy of surviving," the Los Angeles-based Prager told the full house at the Toronto Centre for the Arts on June 26. "I don't want to rely on Arafat or on Nazis to stay Jewish."

Though not wishing to proselytize, Prager said he believes the Torah's innate wisdom is relevant to all peoples.

"It is inconceivable that the Torah has only something to say to the Jews. It's like saying that vitamin C is only good for Presbyterians," he said, eliciting a laugh from the 970 people in attendance.

"The Torah is too profound to only be learnable from by a Jew," he continued. "Only Jews are obligated to follow its laws, of course that's true. But its insights, its values and its wisdom are either universally applicable, or they are not applicable to Jews."

Dennis Prager

Raised in an Orthodox home in Brooklyn, Prager said he resented the fact his yeshiva world lacked "an ability to take the non-Jew and the non-Orthodox Jew seriously. It seemed the only people to be taken seriously thought and talked and observed like they did."

The occasion of Prager's lecture was the June 29 yahrzeit of the Lubavitcher Rebbe. He lauded Chabad's choice to "just say no: No, we are not going to judge Jews by how many hours they keep between milk and meat – in fact, if they keep any at all. [Chabad] has achieved something remarkable here: they don't measure Jews by their observance."

He said he disagrees with Orthodox Jews who say discussing Jewish values with the rest of the world is futile.

If the focus is only on Jews who have left Judaism, "you'll never find them," he cautioned. "We [Jews] have to announce to the world what we stand for. Then, Jews will find us.

"The moment you say only Jews can prosper from what Judaism has to say, you are in effect saying to most alienated Jews that Judaism is ethnicity, not wisdom. But it is wisdom."

Addressing the title of his talk, "Why be Jewish," Prager said the answer can be found by examining what he called Judaism's "trinity": "It's God, Torah and Israel. Those are the three dimensions of Judaism. You can't have two. That is what Judaism consists of, along with chosenness."

Regarding God, Prager said he would despair if he lost his faith. "The reason is simple. The world is too awful. I have asked on my radio show: 'If you don't believe in God and you are sensitive to human suffering, please call me and tell me how you don't go crazy.'"

Prager said his phone has yet to ring.

"I get many calls from atheists, but I never got a call to answer that," he said. "It is not possible to be sensitive to human suffering, not believe in God and not go a little nuts."

He added that what keeps him sane is the belief that there is a good God ultimately governing the universe. "Can I account for every instance of unjust suffering? Of course I can't."

It's unreasonable to think that God would meddle in every injustice, Prager said. "If God interfered every time, we would be robots."

Prager explained the Torah's relevance using a modern analogy: "One day, I realized why I never learned to program my VCR, which I had owned for years. It was because I never read the instruction book.

"Then it dawned on me: If I need an instruction book for something trivial like my VCR, I need one for how to live life. It is dangerous to believe we're naturally good – if we are, then we don't need an instruction book. The Torah is so relevant. How do I know what position to take on any given subject? By asking my heart? I don't trust my heart."

Prager said he believes the Torah is a divine book, a confession that he called "a big deal, coming from a Jew who can't call himself Orthodox."

If men had written the Torah, he said, Jews would have come out looking much better.

"The Christians of the New Testament are terrific. The Muslims of the Koran are terrific. The Jews of the Jewish Bible stink. Why on earth would people portray themselves so negatively? That's the greatest single argument for the divinity of the Bible."

Ultimately, Prager maintains that there are intellectual reasons for being Jewish, and that "if you showed the Jews the relevance of Judaism, they wouldn't leave."

If you examine Judaism rationally, he said, "I have no doubt that you'll say that the Torah is the way to live."

The new NGO campaign against Israel

May saw three gatherings in Europe where anti-Semites could party.

In Paris, at the 23rd annual Assembly of Muslims in France, held May 5 to 8, the good name of French Islam was abused by the marketing, in French and Arabic, of variants on the Protocols of Zion. The gathering analyzed a multitude of Jewish crimes, such as the naqba, the "disaster" of Israel's creation, which figured in the keynote speech on "The Tragedy of Palestine" by Mufti Tayssir Tamimi, president of the Palestinian Supreme Sharia Court.

In Athens, the fourth European Social Forum (ESF), held May 4 to 7, illustrated once again how "Palestine" has taken over much of the agenda of the anti-globalization movement. While officially rejecting anti-Semitism and decrying Holocaust denial, the cornerstone of every debate and discussion was undoing the "original sin" of Israel's creation in 1948.

The response was a new slogan for the NGO campaign that now plans to become a co-ordinated international solidarity movement: BDS, an acronym for boycott, divestment, sanctions.

A handout defined boycotts as the refusal by individuals, civil society and business to buy or sell Israeli products; divestment was defined as the withdrawal of investments from companies directly or indirectly involved with Israel; and sanctions were defined as governmental restrictions on travel, communication, trade, finance, arms sales, etc. Discussion focused on harnessing the momentum of boycotts, in which a critical mass rejects, for example, Israeli fruit sales, so that companies and, perhaps later, governments will follow.

The boycotts were presented as worthwhile irrespective of their economic impact, for even if they are reversed by "Zionist pressure," their short-term effectiveness is in garnering media publicity. "Divestment, as by churches, should not be measured by the amount of funds divested alone, but by its repercussions on concepts and attitudes," the handout said.

In Athens, proposals were mooted for such things as grassroots provocations –such as filling supermarket carts with Israeli produce, crashing the cashiers, burning the products in the street – and a pan-European itinerant caravan to promote BDS. Other ideas included study tours to Palestinian refugee camps and olive-picking vacations for European youth, to more diffuse ideas on "combating the Apartheid Wall," "pushing the right of return," "freeing political prisoners," and promoting "the one-state solution."

In late May, the parade moved on to Geneva for the "International Conference for a Just Peace in Palestine and Israel: Enforce International Law." The carnival atmosphere in Athens had quickly degenerated into accolades for Hamas' election ("Hamas and Hezbollah will destroy Israel," one London Islamist said happily). But the Geneva agenda was more focused. Participants each brought a pet target to attack or promote, such as EU-Israel scientific co-operation programs; evangelical Zionist movements; arresting Israeli reserve officers visiting or studying in Europe; and encouraging Israelis to refuse military service.

So where was the anti-Semitism?

In Athens, for instance, members of the Greek neo-Nazi group Golden Dawn infiltrated the forum and proudly distributed their magazine devoted to the glorious partnership between Arabs and Nazis under Hitler and their common agenda today. At the same time, a World Social Forum banner announced: "Nazis, Yankees, Jews – No more Chosen Peoples!"

Later, in Geneva, more than 180 NGOs quibbled over "BDS" campaigns and planned a climactic global mobilization for May 2008 to mark Israel's 60th anniversary as "the Year of the naqba." The Paris assembly's keynote speaker, Mufti Tayssir Tamimi, dropped in to bless the campaigners.

The NGO campaigns that favour "BDS" – from the BRICUP (British Committee for the Universities of Palestine) academic boycott to a divestment drive by the World Council of Churches – and the other 170 Geneva plotters, are, at best, in contravention of European Union laws on freedom of commerce, and they might arguably be contributing to a blueprint for the ultimate solution: the end of the Jewish state.

Hitler, too, called Jews "our misfortune," or ungluck in German. Now the catchword is naqba.

The prelude to the Holocaust was the slogan Kaufen nicht bei Juden ("Buy not from the Jews"). Today, it is "BDS."

In Athens, a misguided, but pleasant young Belgian Jew spoke of how he planned to provoke passersby by building a wall out of Jaffa-orange boxes – complete with checkpoints and friends in Israel Defence Forces uniforms – across a Brussels thoroughfare.

Two young Palestinians in the audience were overheard discussing the speaker in animated Arabic.

One asked, "Why is this Jew talking this way?"

His companion responded, "He is a good Jew who believes in our struggle."

The first responded, "Yitbach al-Yahud" ("Slaughter the Jews"), and they both had a good chuckle.

Quite a party!

Some books of summer

Though school's out, reading should never stop, so here's my annual summer book review.

I began Alan Morinis' Climbing Jacob's Ladder with relatively few expectations, thinking it might be a pleasant account of his spiritual journey. But as the book progressed, I found myself increasingly drawn into Morinis' world of mussar and the practical exercises that each person can do to enhance the quality of everyday life. His quest is proof that Jewish ethical teaching has much to offer any spiritual seeker.

A similar sensibility infuses Yair Caspi's Lidrush Elokim (To Search out God), which I mentioned recently in another column. Caspi opens the book with a description of how his life was changed by a regular Saturday night chavurah at the home of famed Israeli philosopher Yeshayahu Leibowitz, from which Caspi emerged, in his words, "an altogether different man."

Caspi investigates the possibility of viewing Judaism as a spiritual system that can elevate one's soul and repair the world. This book has touched a chord among many secular Israelis who would ordinarily never identify themselves as seeking out the divine. However, it has not been translated from its original Hebrew into English.

The MeOtzar Harav series has been systematically publishing the writings of Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik. One of the finest in the series was printed last year under the title The Emergence of Ethical Man. The book is an intense analysis of the place of humanity in the order of things, with discussions of man as part of nature and the relationship between the ethical and the natural.

Jaroslav Pelikan is one the finest religious historians alive, and his thoroughly enjoyable Whose Bible is It? gives the reader a whirlwind tour of just how varied the historical interpretation of Scripture has been. Tracing the development of both the Jewish and Christian Bibles, Pelikan examines how books become part of religious canons and why the Bible remains the most influential literary product in human experience.

In Off the Derekh, Faranak Margolese provides a fairly frank account of why some Orthodox Jews rebel against religion and leave the fold of observance. The book is strong in evoking the emotional turmoil and alienation that such people suffer, and it also traces the roots of how they come to feel that there is no place for them within the world of tradition. But the author seems to pull her punches somewhat and is reticent to directly target the real systemic issues within Orthodox communities that can be directly responsible for the phenomenon being described.

And for those who like their books banned, there is the second edition of Rabbi Nathan Kamenetsky's lengthy The Making of a Godol. With laborious footnotes and excursuses, this work plumbs into the history of the yeshiva world at the turn of the 20th century by focusing on certain revered figures within that now vanished reality. Banned not once but twice, the book is not available in mainstream bookstores, but it can still be obtained through a bookseller in Monsey, N.Y.

An introduction to Spinoza's ideas

Betraying Spinoza: The Renegade Jew Who Gave Us Modernity* by Rebecca Goldstein, Random House.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Baruch, later Benedict, de Spinoza (1632-1677) was born in Amsterdam to a family of Marranos who had fled from the Inquisition in Portugal.

In his early 20s, Baruch began to voice opinions that were considered heretical. His dissident views and utterances on religion awakened the suspicions of both the ruling Calvinists and members of the Jewish community. He refused to remain silent and in 1656, aged 23, he was dramatically excommunicated from family, friends and community.

For the rest of his brief life he lived as a Dutch citizen and philosopher, earning his living by grinding and polishing lenses.

It has often been pointed out, in view of Christian opposition to Spinoza's opinions, that the Jewish community had little option. At one point, he was even offered a modest annuity if he would consent to maintain at least an external loyalty to his faith.

In Betraying Spinoza, Rebecca Goldstein, a novelist and professor of philosophy, sets out to rediscover the flesh and blood personality often hidden under his abstruse philosophy, and also how his Jewish heritage influenced his thinking.

In a major work, simply entitled Ethics, which is rigorously organized in geometric form like Euclid's Elements, Spinoza maintained that everything that exists is part of a single substance of the deity who, in fact, is identical with nature. In this pantheistic outlook, God is impersonal, not subject to human prayer, and freedom of will for the individual is an illusion.

Human beings are subject to ever-changing combinations of desire, pleasure and pain, and concerned with self-interest. In order to overcome this "human bondage," "we should learn to moderate our desires, live according to reason and ultimately aspire to a kind of intellectual love of God. This acceptance of the universe as it is will create an inner peace of mind, or 'blessedness.'"

Spinoza doesn't reject the body or the delights of the world. "It is the part of a wise man, I say, to refresh and restore himself in moderation with pleasant food and drink, with scents, with the beauty of green plants, with decoration, music, sports, the theatre, and other things of this kind, which anyone can use without injury to another. For the human body is composed of a great many parts of different natures, which constantly require new and varied nourishment. And we should strive to be cheerful."

The author writes that in many ways Spinoza's ideas are painfully relevant to the "mess of our times." He was a firm advocate of free speech and rejected the stranglehold of religion on the state. He believed in the unimpeded progress of science and strongly opposed denial of its findings.

He is widely acknowledged as the political theorist who first set out the general principles for a secular democratic society.

Rabbi Louis Jacobs writes, "From time to time, attempts have been made to reclaim Spinoza for Judaism. If this means that Spinoza was a Jew and an admirable person who did not deserve to have been placed under the ban, many Jews would go along with it. But if it means that Spinoza's philosophy is compatible with Judaism, Spinoza himself would have rejected totally any such claim."

In our time, Spinoza is generally seen by Jews as extraneous to the faith, even if they feel proud of his influence on world philosophy.

This brief engaging book is a rich, illuminating study of a brilliant, many-sided personality and a helpful introduction to some of Spinoza's basic metaphysical and ethical ideas. Of Spinoza, Bertrand Russell wrote, "He is the noblest and most lovable of the great philosophers… ethically he is supreme."

Tfillin lore and links, Pt. 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Although it is usually known by its Hebrew name, you will also see tfillin referred to as "phylacteries." That term seems to derive from the Greek phylacterion meaning safeguard or amulet. I came upon quite a lively discussion of the word's origins at yourdictionary.com, where one person named Flaminius makes this point: "'Phylacteries' is the only word I know so far of an exclusively Judaic item introduced to English in disguise of Greek language. Jews call it tfillin, an Aramaic word, perhaps related to Hebrew tfillah. In Biblical Hebrew, it is called totafot, for which no solid etymology has been established." [http://tinyurl.com/7joar]

The best way to learn how to don tfillin is by personal demonstration. However, if you'd like to brush up on the sometimes intricate placement of the boxes and binding of the straps, you can find step-by-step instructions on the web. The Davening.net site has illustrations to keep you on track. [www.davening.net/tefillin.html]

Those, of course, are the basics. If you want to delve into the intricacies of the commandments – and you have a good understanding of Hebrew – then check out the detailed laws at easyrashi.com. Rabbi Aryeh Schechter is a Brooklyn, New York-based sofer, or scribe, who has put together the most comprehensive tfillin resource on the web that I've come across. You are greeted by a page with five animated photos, so that you can see a "beating heart" inside the chest in order to give you an idea of the proper placement of the tfillin. [http://easyrashi.com/TEFILLIN/TEFILIN123.htm]

While there, you can download a comprehensive PowerPoint demonstration on tfillin. There are more than 50 pages of information from Shulchan Aruch HaRav that deal with issues such as what to do if you only have one box, replacement of defective parts and the proper decorum while wearing tfillin. (Technical note: I found that the Hebrew on this site displayed backward while in Internet Explorer. It displayed perfectly in Firefox. [www.mozilla.com/firefox/])

Since proper placement of the tfillin is critical, it is not uncommon to see men carry small pocket mirrors to monitor how the box is resting on their heads. The author of one website bemoans the modern ubiquity of mirrors and harkens back to simpler times. "Without the mirror, the only way to fulfil the mitzvah of tfillin correctly is through areivus, each person in the minyan taking responsibility for each other's tfillin. Tfillin actually underscored the unity of the minyan, and the brotherhood of all Jews… Now that we have mirrors, all we can see is ourselves." [http://tinyurl.com/nsl7q]

In Deuteronomy, the Torah doesn't actually give a reason for putting on tfillin. In Tfillin and its Significance, you will find the thoughts of great thinkers including 19th-century Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch. He wrote: "A truth, in order to produce results, must be impressed upon the mind and heart repeatedly and emphatically. Merely to acknowledge the essential principles of righteousness and love is not sufficient to actually build up such a life… In addition thereto, symbolic words and actions are necessary so that they may become indelibly stamped upon the soul, and thus preserved for yourself and for others." [http://tinyurl.com/sy9pa]

The late Rabbi Aryeh Kaplan wrote in 1986, "When a man wears tfillin, he binds himself to the very highest spiritual level. He achieves a closeness to God that even the deepest meditation could not accomplish… even the physical act in itself can bring a man to the loftiest heights." [http://tinyurl.com/ozde4]

Steven Schram would certainly agree. Writing in the Journal of Chinese Medicine, Schram is the author of Tfillin: An Ancient Acupuncture Point Prescription for Mental Clarity. Using detailed descriptions and illustrations, Schram compares the placement of tfillin to the corresponding acupuncture pressure points. [http://handyworks.com/public/tefillin.pdf]

His conclusion: "Regardless of the belief system behind the procedure, it seems clear that putting on tfillin is a unique way of stimulating a very precise set of acupuncture points that appears designed to clear the mind and harmonize the spirit."

Former showbiz bigwig now wears one

By JESSICA FREIMAN
CJN Intern

"This was how important I used to be," said former NBC producer Molly Resnick, holding up photographs of herself embracing Sean Connery, Roger Moore, Sophia Loren and Henry Winkler, better known as the Fonz from Happy Days.

Resnick was referring to a journey that has taken her from a childhood as a Bulgarian-born secular Israeli to a job as host and producer of an influential TV talk show to her current lifestyle as an Orthodox Jew.

It all started when she "left the land of milk and honey for the land of gold and money," Resnick told the audience at the Judith Dan Memorial Lecture on "From Hollywood to Holy Wood" at Toronto's Village Shul last week.

Shortly after coming to the United States from Israel in 1972, Resnick landed a dream job as a producer and host at NBC's New York-based "Five Minutes With..."

"Anybody who was anybody wanted to be on my show," she said. "I used to pinch myself. Moshe Dayan and Abba Eban were in my office. This was the most amazing life dream that you could imagine."

She was poised to "conquer the world," Resnick said, but two incidents led her to question whether the path she was on was the right one for her.

The first incident was a brush with John Travolta. He was scheduled to appear on her show to promote Saturday Night Fever, which would become a big hit in the 1970s, and Resnick had prepared an introduction stating that not all movie critics were fond of Travolta's performance.

"Travolta's agent read the introduction I had written and said, 'If you say these things, we're not letting him on the show.'

"I said, 'The door is open.'

"As they were filing out, I asked John, 'Don't you have something to say on the subject?' He shrugged. Here was the megastar and he couldn't make a decision about a meagre interview. He was just a puppet on a string, part of a media apparatus. This made me wonder if this was what life was all about," she said.

The second incident came on the heels of the 1975 United Nations resolution declaring that Zionism equals racism.

"I got a call from the head of the Anti-Defamation League asking me to run an interview to refute that Zionism is racism. I thought it was a great idea. My first instinct was to call the PLO to have a 'balanced interview.' It was forbidden for Israelis to contact the PLO, but I also had American citizenship.

"So I called them and said I was with NBC," she said.

When Resnick told the PLO representative she was originally from Tel Aviv, "he knew I was an idiot. He said, 'You're from Tel Aviv and you want me to say Zionism is racism?'"

After having a PLO member question her attachment to her own nation, Resnick became uncertain about the life she was leading and decided to take a leave of absence.

In her subsequent travels, she met a Lubavitch family in Brazil. She connected with their daughter and became so impressed with her lifestyle and outlook on life that Resnick decided to become observant.

"I thought to myself, 'What am I going to tell NBC?' God is almost like a four-letter word in Hollywood."

Meanwhile, Resnick said, NBC was preparing to offer her "the job of the millennium. NBC got the contract to cover the 1980 Moscow Olympics, and I was [asked] to run a human interest unit in Moscow, covering stories about individual contestants out of Moscow.

"I told that VP that I couldn't accept the job because I observe the Sabbath. " The VP said, 'Someone as smart as you is going for institutional religion?'"

Resnick didn't take the job. As she walked out of his office, she said she felt as though she had experienced her own Akedah (the biblical sacrifice of Isaac).

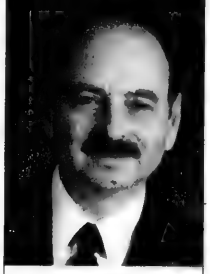
"My Israeli friends were very supportive," Resnick joked. "They said I should just cut my arm off."

But Resnick had the last laugh: The United States ended up boycotting the Moscow Olympics. And NBC didn't cover them.

"In Judaism, you are supposed to view life as though you are both dust of the earth [and yet] the entire world was created for you alone.

"I really believe that they cancelled the Olympics because of moi," she smiled.

APPOINTMENT



Dr. Jack N. Lightstone

Brock University is pleased to announce the appointment of Dr. Jack Lightstone as its President and Vice-Chancellor, effective July 1, 2006.

ש'שאר ע'נינו

גידי קורן וחברים

יונה ונער

מאיר שלו כותב בסגנון ה "ריאליזם הפנטסטי", בדומה לחתן פרס נובל, המקסיקני מרקז. הכל נראה ריאלי, אך מפעם לפעם שוזרים פרטים דמיוניים שאינם נזרעים כהוא זה מן האמיתות של הסיפור.

מכתב לאמא

"אמא יקרה, אני מצטערת להודיע לך על זה בצורה כואת, אבל עזבתי את הבית והצטרפתי לחבר שלי ואנחנו עוברים לגור ביחד. אני בהריון ומארק אמר לי שנחיה מאוד שמחים בקהילה ביער לא רחוק מההורים שלו. הוא רוצה הרבה ילדים וזה אחד מהחלומות שלי.

תנקשרי להודיע מתי יהיה בטוח לחזור הביתה...

גביע העולם

Grant awarded to document Ont. Jewish history

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The Ontario Jewish Archives is getting set to launch an 18-month project to document the histories of 11 Jewish communities in small Ontario towns.

"The Ontario Small Jewish Communities Project is all about trying to document the history of small Jewish communities across the province from Cornwall to Thunder Bay," said Ellen Scheinberg, the Ontario Jewish Archives (OJA) director.

The OJA was recently awarded $117,000 by the Ontario Trillium Foundation, an agency of the Ministry of Culture, and will partner with the Ontario Historical Society and the Regional Jewish Communities of Ontario.

Scheinberg said it has been about 30 years since the OJA received a grant.

"Nothing really has been done since then because it's really expensive and time-consuming, so we thought this would be a good time to try to create a new initiative. Thankfully, we got the Trillium grant," she said.

"The timing is really good because a lot of these communities are at a point where they have very few members left. I think it would be terrific to have something on the web to highlight the unique history of each town."

The towns that are included in the project are Cornwall, Kingston, Belleville, Kitchener/Waterloo, Niagara Falls, St. Catharines, Peterborough, North Bay, Owen Sound, Sudbury and Thunder Bay.

Scheinberg added that while many of the Jewish families who helped build these communities had opened up shops and businesses, they left once there was a decline in the local economy and their children reached university age, but many families stayed.

"We want to show people that Jews don't just live in Montreal, Toronto, Vancouver and Winnipeg," she said.

OJA chair Brooky Robins grew up in North Bay, so she understands the importance of documenting the Jewish histories of small towns.

"When you grow up in a community in a small town, you feel like you're a child of that community, like you belong to that community," Robins said.

The grant enables the OJA to hire an oral historian for 25 weeks, to interview about six people from each town, and to bring in a researcher/writer for about a year, to track down historical documents and photographs.

"In the past they would train 10 or 20 volunteers and that is really amazing to have people contribute their time, but sometimes the interviews aren't alike at all," Scheinberg said, adding that having only one researcher and writer will add to the continuity of the project.

"Research like this has never been done before," Robins said. "I think everyone will be proud of the way this project is being done."

"I've spoken to a web designer and what we decided is that we'll have a map of Ontario and then you can click on the cities or the 11 towns. You'll just be drawn into the history and images of the town, from the first Jews to today. Each one will kind of be separate, but very accessible. Hopefully, we'll draw in a lot of young viewers who might find it fun and interactive," Scheinberg said.

She added that those who know about the project are excited and eager to begin the process.

"I think a lot of people can't afford to do this themselves, and they really feel like they have a rich history and they'd love to do it themselves, but they can't. We're hoping to include them as partners, so that they'll be involved and they can participate on that level."

Robins is confident that the project will create a sense of pride in the Jewish communities that played such an important role in Canadian history.

"I think [the website] will give them a background and history of the roots of Canadian Jewry. It'll help give them a sense of where they came from and give them memories," Robins said.

"While now, 40 or 50 per cent of Canada's Jews live in Toronto, in the last century and the century before that, in the late 19th, the Jews arrived and many of them headed to smaller communities where there was less competition. To look at Ontario's Jewish history, you really have to look beyond Toronto for the early years and to look at the diversity," Scheinberg said.

The project will begin this summer and the website will be launched in the winter of 2008.

If anyone from Cornwall, Kingston, Belleville, Kitchener/Waterloo, Niagara Falls, St. Catharines, Peterborough, North Bay, Owen Sound, Sudbury or Thunder Bay, particularly those residing elsewhere now, has documentation, photography, film or artifacts, please e-mail Ellen Scheinberg at EScheinberg@ujafed.org.

L'chaim Retirement Home

On a Personal Note...

"Since the passing of my father in 1990, it was my dream to establish a home for the elderly in which they could feel secure. My father lived in a retirement home for 7 years. I spent much of my time with him, discussing what made him feel happy and secure.

That dream became a reality when I opened L'chaim. It fulfils my father's wishes and my dreams.

I am certain that we can help you and your family make the right choice, which is all that I hoped for my dear father." — Sincerely, Judy Cohen, Founder

Editorials give context that news coverage lacks

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

It's no surprise that Israel's military operation in Gaza, aimed at freeing kidnapped Israel Defence Forces Cpl. Gilad Shalit, is attracting intense media attention. What is striking is the contrast between daily news reports focusing on the hardships encountered by Palestinian civilians and editorials that put the operation into perspective by exploring the broader context.

The New York Times June 29 editorial "Hamas Provokes a Fight" was blunt: "The Palestinians who futilely threw up sand berms on Gaza's main roads to deflect Israeli troop movements were building their defences in the wrong direction. The responsibility for this latest escalation rests squarely with Hamas, whose military wing tunneled into Israel on Sunday [June 25], killed two Israeli soldiers and kidnapped another. This was a followup to a declaration earlier [in June] by Hamas' political leadership that the group's 16-month intermittent ceasefire would no longer be observed.

"Under the circumstances an Israeli military response was inevitable."

While the Times urged Israel to show restraint, it left no doubt that Hamas' "reckless" provocations necessitated Israel's military response.

The National Post's June 29 editorial "Israel has a right to defend itself" reminded readers of Israel's unilateral withdrawal from Gaza: "The Jewish state did not relinquish control over Gaza 10 months ago only so it could have the fun of reoccupying it now. This military operation is an effort, simply, by Israel to defend itself…

"If the Hamas-led government of the Palestinian Authority is going to shirk its domestic responsibilities to maintain civil order, and its international responsibilities to respect neighbouring countries, then Israel will have to act as it has, and fulfill those responsibilities on their behalf."

The June 30 Globe and Mail editorial "No simple cycle" broadened the context, explaining that Israel has to contend with the persistent firing of Qassam rockets into its southern communities – assaults that are ignored, and even encouraged, by Hamas.

The Globe wrote: "Israel's anger is quite understandable. The Jewish state finds itself facing a Palestinian government that condones suicide bombings against Israeli civilians. Despite international entreaties, Hamas has refused to renounce violence or recognize existing peace agreements with Israel. Indeed, its military wing recently ended a truce that it had observed since February 2005. Hamas said it did so because of Israeli attacks on Palestinian targets, but those attacks came only because Palestinians were firing rockets into Israel. This is not just tit for tat, nor is it a 'cycle of violence.'"

The Globe argued that the violence would stop "if Hamas and other militant groups put aside the gun."

Like the Times, the Globe urged Israel to practice military restraint, criticizing specific actions such as the destruction of a power station in Gaza as "ill-considered."

Which brings us to the daily news reports focusing on Israel's military operations and the subsequent hardships to Palestinian civilians, such as destroyed bridges, a lack of electricity, and frightening sonic booms. Once again, the story is all too often about the Israeli Goliath versus the helpless Palestinian victims. Numerous Palestinians are interviewed while few Israeli voices are heard, and the context found in the editorials is lacking.

For example, Margaret Evans generally files evenhanded reports for CBC Radio from Israel. But during the present crisis, she has focused mainly on Palestinian suffering in Gaza, interviewing a critical United Nations official one day and the mayor of Gaza City the next, with hardly a reference to Israel's side of the story.

On July 5, Evans reported that a rocket was fired on the Israeli port city of Ashkelon, but she didn't mention the fact that this marked a significant escalation in the conflict. Instead, the bulk of her report was a human interest story about Palestinians and the World Cup: "The threat of nightly Israeli air strikes is not enough to keep people indoors. Many were determined to watch the World Cup game between Italy and Germany. But even here soccer is political. Many Palestinians back Italy because of the Italian Soccer Federation's decision to dedicate their World Cup win to the Palestinian people way back in 1982."

Weisz is number 2 in Hamilton

By HOLLY GINSLER
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — A contest was recently held here to find the "Greatest Hamiltonian of All Time."

The contest was part of the Hamilton Spectator's memory project, which celebrates the 160th anniversaries of both the newspaper and the City of Hamilton. The newspaper offered readers a list of candidates to vote for, some living, some deceased. Former Ontario lieutenant-governor Lincoln Alexander won the competition, and Arthur Weisz, a Hungarian Jew who survived the Holocaust and has lived in Hamilton for 54 years, came a close second.

"I felt surprised and proud," Weisz said of the honour. "I would never have believed that this could happen. Many people know me in Hamilton… I've been in real estate for 52 years and I've met a lot of people. The result is that many believe that what I'm doing is right, and they voted for me."

He is also known for his charity work. His favourite charity is Shalom Village, which provides services for older adults, including long-term care and assisted living apartments. In 2004, Arthur and Margaret Weisz established a bursary for students enrolled in McMaster who demonstrated financial need.

Weisz is a family man, and Effort Trust is a family business. His son, son-in-law and grandson all work in the company. He has been married to Margaret for over 60 years and has a son, Tom, and a daughter, Janet. He has grandchildren and great-grandchildren.

Finding your passion and your purpose

Life Coach Corner

Judy Siblin Librach

Imagine springing out of bed each morning knowing you are doing exactly what you love to do, are passionate about, and can't wait to start doing. The most joyful people are often those who have a purpose or a mission that motivates, inspires and drives them forward.

According to Jack Canfield in The Success Principles; How to Get from Where You Are to Where You Want to Be, purpose comes from "doing what you what you were born to do. It comes from following your heart and trusting your joy as a guide. Enthusiasm and passion come as a result of caring about what you do."

As we all know, passion makes your day go by quickly. But the greatest key to passion is usually having it connected to your sense of purpose. Passion is your heart's desire, the thing that makes you get up in the morning or the activity that gives you joy. It could be baking bread, climbing mountains, singing, dancing, writing music, golfing, playing sports, or travelling the world. So the activity that inspires you is your passion.

But your purpose is the reason you find joy in your passion. It's the "why" behind the passion. You may find joy in baking bread because it makes people feel good or reminds you of the connection you had with your grandmother. If your passion is singing in front of an audience, then your purpose might be to entertain children and make them feel special.

When we love what do so much that we would practically do it for free, that's often a clue that the work we're doing is deeply fulfilling. When we are fulfilled in our life and our work, we tend to be hugely successful at it. According to Malcolm S. Forbes, the publisher of Forbes magazine, "Success follows doing what you want to do. There is no other way to be successful. The biggest mistake people make in life is not trying to make a living at doing what they most enjoy doing."

Everything makes sense when we've found our purpose, everything comes together, and usually, when we are purposeful, we are happier and at peace.

As Dr. Wayne Dyer says, "If you want to find your true purpose in life, know this for certain: Your purpose will only be found in service to others, and in being connected to something far greater than your mind, body or ego."

What is interesting, however, is that finding your passion and your purpose is not always simple. It helps to brainstorm with a friend, coach or someone you trust. Sometimes it helps to write things out, and in the book Journaling for Joy, Joyce Chapman has some great tips on how to start figuring out your sense of purpose.

Remember that each of us has unique gifts, talents and capabilities. What are your unique gifts that make you stand out from the rest? What are you passionate about? What do you love to do?

It often helps to look back at the experiences in your life that gave you a feeling of being incredibly happy and alive. What were they? Write them down and watch for patterns to emerge.

A great exercise to tap into your purpose is to do a visualization where you remember a time in your life when you were at your best, in your element. What were you doing? What was happening? Who were you with? What was the impact on the people watching you? What was the impact on you?

One of the best techniques comes from the book Vivation by Jim Leonard and Phil Laut. It is so simple, that you almost don't believe it will work, but it does, every time. They suggest asking yourself three questions: What do you like about yourself? How do you like to spend your time? What is your idea of a perfect world?

Your purpose is what links these three things together. You can then use your favourite characteristics, values, abilities and attributes in activities you like to manifest your vision of a perfect world.

As H.I. Khan says, "However unhappy a person may be, the moment he knows the purpose of his life, a switch is turned and the light is on. If he has to strive after that purpose all his life, he does not mind, so long as he knows what that purpose is."

Seniors group marks 36 years

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

In an atmosphere of fun and camaraderie, some 200 men and women of the Association of Jewish Seniors (AJS) met on a beautiful morning at the Earl Bales Community Centre last month for the group's annual meeting.

AJS – an umbrella group of individuals, seniors centres, organizations and clubs – is celebrating 36 years of making the community more aware of issues facing older people and of advocating on their behalf.

The group holds monthly educational and social gatherings at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue and a second Passover seder at the Bernard Betel Centre, as well as other holiday events.

President Ben Goldmintz opened the recent annual meeting – titled, "To Our Good Health" – with a warm welcome to members and guests.

The event, which concluded with a lunch sponsored by Kensington Place Retirement Residence, was interspersed with comedy quips from Reta Duenisch-Turner, an AJS member who has performed at Yuk Yuk's and Buddies in Bad Times Theatre. She proudly told The CJN: "I will be 80 next month."

Executive member Esther Pohn also got everyone moving with some stretch exercises, and Leah & Leon provided lively musical entertainment.

Evelyn Shulman, an AJS vice-president, spoke about the group's outstanding volunteers, and Goldmintz was presented with the Sam Shapiro Award "for his outstanding commitment and volunteer services."

The late Sam Shapiro was a very active member of AJS. His wife Libby presented the award to Goldmintz with words of gratitude.

Throughout the morning, vice-president Ray Sadowski and Sid Gladstone, the AJS' communications and media representative, gave numerous door prizes. The highlight of the day was a talk by CJN columnist and registered dietitian/nutritionist Lisa Weinberg titled "The Oy of Eating."

Weinberg spoke about trends and hot issues, including the need to understand food labels and nutritional balance, as well as what foods to eat each day and how to shop at the grocery store.

Weinberg also provided a list of suggested foods, as well as ones that should be included in a daily diet.

"And you should drink at least four cups of water daily," she said.

The AJS is funded through Circle of Care and donations. Membership is open to any seniors group or individual.

For more information or to register, call co-ordinator Tammy Parker at 416-635-2860, ext. 458, or e-mail ajs@circleofcare.com.

Guardian Angels hit the streets of Toronto

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

After donning their trademark red berets and matching satin jackets, members of the first Canadian chapter of the Guardian Angels, an anti-crime group, will be on the streets of Toronto today.

Last week, roughly 2,000 Torontonians became Guardian Angels, graduating and attending a ceremony held at the William Dennison Seniors' Residence at Dundas and Sherbourne streets in downtown Toronto, Lou Hoffer, the Guardian Angels Canada national director, said.

Curtis Sliwa, the founder and president of Guardian Angels, attended the graduation ceremony, as well as the press conference that preceded it.

Hoffer, a former Toronto Police officer and a ba'al tshuvah, described how he first became involved with the 27-year-old organization, and his efforts to build a Canadian chapter.

"About two years ago, I reached out to Curtis Sliwa and the Guardian Angels because of a rash of anti-Semitic incidents in North York and York Region – Pride of Israel [synagogue] was vandalized, 13 houses were defaced with swastikas, a couple [Jewish] cemeteries had tombstones knocked over and had swastikas painted on them – so being a former Toronto Police officer, I reached out. It's an organization I had followed for over 20 years," he said.

He said that although nothing materialized then, he wasn't discouraged. He got in touch with Sliwa again, when there was a dramatic rise in gun violence in Toronto.

"About eight or nine months ago, because of the rash of gun violence, we reconnected and fully formulated the idea of bringing the Guardian Angels to Toronto and lo and behold, it took off from there," he said, adding that things progressed so quickly that he became the head of the entire Canadian operations.

Although Toronto has the only fully active chapter in Canada, others have already begun to organize in Calgary, Edmonton, Vancouver, Winnipeg and Saskatoon.

Hoffer said that next month, he'll embark on a three-week cross-Canada tour to recruit volunteers and spread awareness about the organization.

While Hoffer said that the response from the community has been very positive, Toronto Mayor David Miller and Toronto Police Chief Bill Blair are less than enthusiastic about the American group branching into Canada.

Opponents of the Guardian Angels accuse the volunteers, who are provided with CPR, first aid and self-defence training, of being vigilantes who threaten to cause more crime than to prevent it by provoking dangerous situations and making citizens' arrests.

But Hoffer said the organization has worked hard over the years to make the streets safe through education, crime prevention programs, and by providing extra sets of eyes and ears.

"The Guardian Angels are really a non-violent organization, a community organization that is a proactive presence. They stand back and observe, yet they are on the street and a visual deterrent," Hoffer said.

"We do not want to do police work, we leave policing to the police. The community is all for us," he continued. "They're aware of who we are and what we do. I'm hoping that once we go on the streets, enough people will send word to the Toronto Police and city hall."

Hoffer said he recently returned from a trip to New York City for training, and met with the New York City Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly, who was amazed when he heard that the Toronto mayor and police chief declined to meet with him on numerous occasions.

"[He] can't understand because [the New York police] see this organization do amazing things, help to reduce crime in New York, and they think, how can the city shun us? How do you say no to help?" Hoffer said.

He said that Guardian Angels, which relies on the donations of private donors since it is not funded by the government, empowers communities in hopes of "making a moral difference.

"We are in moral decay and the police can't do it alone. I'm biased, I used to be a police officer. I think our cops are tops, but no city in the world has the budget to put a cop on every corner," Hoffer said.

"We have to lead by example, we cannot leave the situation the way it is to our politicians and to the police. We have to stand up… If that is not in line with Judaism, I don't know what is."

"It is all about helping your fellow man, and making a difference… That is what Judaism is all about. It's about being a good neighbour."

Memorial held for 24-year-old cancer victim

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

About 200 people gathered to pay their last respects late last month to Barak Ben-Nathan, a 24-year-old man who died June 24 after a year-long battle with testicular cancer.

In an Internet blog called Barak's Health, created to inform family and friends about his condition, Ben-Nathan – who was buried June 28 in South Africa, where his parents, Rami and Hanna Ben-Nathan, live – explained how he first discovered he had the disease.

"This whole ordeal began last year in 2005, when I was in Israel with my family, around April. I began to feel some stomach and lower back pains, which were quickly shrugged off as being a result of the crappy mattress that I was sleeping on," Ben-Nathan wrote.

The symptoms continued when Ben-Nathan, a York University student, returned to Toronto.

"The stomach pains persisted, so I went to my local doctor at [York], who prescribed me some antacids… The abdominal pain persisted, and I also began to feel a sharp pain stemming from my left testicle. I returned to the same doctor, who then booked me an ultrasound at a local clinic… At the ultrasound, I was told that I had a four-centimetre mass in my stomach."

The night before a scheduled CT scan, his girlfriend, Samantha Fried, rushed Ben-Nathan to the hospital because he was in extreme pain. He was diagnosed with testicular cancer, and two days later, his left testicle was removed.

He explained that by the time he was diagnosed, the tumour had metastasized in the lymph nodes in his stomach. His doctors considered a stem-cell transplant, but Ben-Nathan would first have to undergo painful chemotherapy for a year in the hope it would make the tumours inactive long enough to do the transplant.

Although early on it seemed that the tumours were responding well to the chemotherapy, they never stayed inactive long enough for Ben-Nathan to receive the stem-cell treatment.

At the June 28 memorial service, held at Chabad Lubavitch of Markham, Ben-Nathan's best friends, Dori Borshiov and Arryn Greenspan spoke not about the tragedy, but about how Ben-Nathan dealt with it in such a courageous way.

"He exemplified character traits that not only inspired me, but also those he surrounded himself with to always live life to the fullest," Greenspan said.

"On the day that Barak found out there was no more the doctors could do for him, he got up and went to a concert with another great friend of ours. His perseverance and love for life never diminished throughout even the most difficult times," he added.

Borshiov said that Ben-Nathan, who was originally from Johannesburg, South Africa, but was living in Toronto on a student visa, used himself as an example of why people should learn to live in the moment and cherish loving relationships.

"He inspired people to call home, to spend time with their grandparents. A friend of his took it upon himself to visit sick people in the hospital," Borshiov said. "Barak led by example. He wouldn't try to draw a lot of attention to himself, he would just do it."

Despite the obstacles brought on by the disease, Ben-Nathan, who was passionate about music, still managed to graduate with a bachelor of fine arts, with honours, from York University.

"His passion for music translated into how he lived his life," Borshiov said.

To remember that passion, Borshiov and Greenspan suggested that people donate to the Rubin Conservatory of Music in Haifa.

"This is an organization that offers comprehensive musical education to children in Haifa aged four to 18 from all social, economic, and religious backgrounds. We know that both music and Israel were both very dear to Barak's heart, and this would be a great way to honour his legacy," Greenspan said.

Borshiov also mentioned that he and Greenspan are organizing a class about "Why bad things happen to good people?" in an attempt to help people cope with Ben-Nathan's death.

Before stepping down from the podium, Borshiov pleaded with the gathering to get checked for cancer by their doctors, because early detection dramatically increases a person's chances of survival.

As Israel fights, Europe starts to squirm

By HERB KEINON
Jerusalem Post

While Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni told the cabinet Sunday that Israel has maintained "a level of understanding and support" abroad for its military actions, the words "disproportionate use of force" and "collective punishment" are increasingly seeping into foreign statements on the situation.

For instance, in a July 7 telephone conversation between Livni and Finnish Foreign Minister Erkki Tuomioja, the Finn – according to European sources – expressed "concern at the new loss of lives caused by the disproportionate use of force by the Israel Defence Forces."

According to the sources, Tuomioja "also reiterated the EU position that the abducted Israeli soldier [Cpl. Gilad Shalit] should be unconditionally released, but his abduction did not authorize collective punishment against the entire population of Gaza." Finland currently holds the rotating presidency of the EU.

During the conversation, according to sources, Tuomioja stressed the importance of opening up border crossings in order to allow humanitarian aid to be delivered. He also said that the "Israeli operation has prompted strong reactions with many countries outside the EU, mentioning especially the Swiss call on Israel to uphold international humanitarian law."

One Foreign Ministry official, however, denied the conversation with the Finnish Foreign Minister signified a change in Europe's attitude toward the Israeli action. He said Livni's comment at the cabinet meeting that there is support and understanding for the action doesn't mean there is no criticism.

The official said that, for the most part, the West is calling for the release of Shalit, acceptance of Israel's right to defend itself, action against terrorism and its infrastructure, and refusal to negotiate with Hamas.

Everything is relative, the official said. "Remember, the IDF is acting in a predominantly civilian area." He said that while Israel is hearing expressions of concern and requests for Israel to show caution, few are questioning Israel's right to take action.

By and large, Livni told the cabinet, as long as the IDF's actions on the ground are perceived abroad as aimed at achieving the stated goals of freeing Shalit, stopping Qassam rocket fire on Israel and changing the rules of the game vis-a-vis Hamas, "it is reasonable to believe that the current level of support would be maintained."

She said she is concerned about a growing tendency toward what she termed "moral equivalency" regarding the crisis, meaning that there is a perception that both sides are responsible for the current crisis, and therefore both sides must come up with solutions.

IDF stay in Gaza may be months

in the cabinet suggested a compromise, a kind of retroactive prisoner swap, could still be in the works.

"The release of the kidnapped soldier will be a must. The moment that Qassam rocket fire also stops, we will enter a period of quiet, at the end of which it will be possible to release prisoners as a goodwill gesture," Israel's internal security minister, Avi Dichter, said at a conference in Tel Aviv. "This is something that Israel has done in the past and that can serve it in the future as well."

The remarks were relayed internationally, prompting Dichter to say he had been misunderstood. But the Palestinians, under pressure to see Israeli forces out of Gaza, were nonetheless encouraged. Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas said he felt a prisoner swap could still be achieved.

In any event, Israel appears to be prepared to keep its forces in Gaza – especially as cross-border rocket fire has continued in defiance of the crackdown. Three people in the Israeli border town of Sderot were wounded by a salvo on their homes Sunday, one of them moderately.

"We are prepared to continue the operation another month, two months and if need be even more," said Maj. Gen. Yoav Gallant, chief of Israel's Southern Command. "When the Palestinians do their overall reckoning in another month or two, and count the hundreds of dead terrorists and the infrastructure that has been damaged, I expect that they will think twice before the next kidnapping attempt."

Jewish astronaut remembers Ilan Ramon

By JUDY SIEGEL-ITZKOVICH
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Garrett Reisman, a 38-year-old Jewish mechanical engineer due to fly in a U.S. space shuttle to the International Space Station in 15 months, has invited Rona Ramon – widow of Israel astronaut Col. Ilan Roman – to give him sentimental objects connected to her husband to take on his mission.

Reisman, born in New Jersey and now being trained as a mission specialist in Houston, told the Jerusalem Post in an interview that he underwent astronaut training along with Ramon and became friendly with him.

Since the explosion of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration's ill-fated Columbia shuttle with Ramon and six other astronauts aboard, Reisman has been assigned to keep in touch with the Ramon family. When Rona invited him to attend last week's ceremony naming Rehovot's Kaplan Medical Center's new emergency medicine department in Ilan's memory, Reisman immediately agreed to come.

As members of the Ramon family, including Ilan's father, hospital director-general Yosef Bar-El and department director Dr. Yael Dinai looked on, the astronaut's widow and Reisman unveiled a sculpture of stone, inset with a metal model of the Columbia.

"Several Jews have already gone to space with NASA astronauts, so I will not be the first, but I remember Ilan saying he looked out at Jerusalem, and I will do the same. It will be a special moment for me," he said.
